Mr. BACON. I shall be more than delighted if they will give us a fund which will enable us to build a structure in which this collection can be placed. That is what was done by the benefactor in that case. Or, if you please, if a donation of any kind is made to us of sufficient value, I will agree that we ourselves shall appropriate so much money to build a structure for it. But that is a very different thing from putting it in the Library building.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I have no doubt that this gift is of much more value than the original amount given by James Smithson.

Mr. BACON. That may be; but if it were a hundred times the value, so much the more would I object to it, because that is a great public building, representing the great public of the United States, and not designed for the commemoration of any man either as to his munificence, or his beneficence, or his virtues, or the love that was his through all the community while he lived or after he was dead. That is not the design of it.

Mr. President, I will state the conditions of this gift: First, that this collection shall not only be known as the Hubbard collection, but that it shall be set apart in an apartment to be known as the Hubbard Gallery.

Mr. PASCO. That is not the full name.

Mr. BACON. I am abbreviating it, of course.

Mr. PASCO. It is to be known as the Gardiner Greene Hubbard Gallery.

Mr. BACON. Of course I simply used the surname by way of expedition. The name is put here in full and in quotation marks, showing that the entire name is intended to be used:

> I desire that a suitable gallery in the Library be devoted to this collection, and such additions as may from time to time be made to it, to be known as the "Gardiner Greene Hubbard Gallery"—

Those words are in quotation marks to show that that name is to be held inviolate and not to be changed—

> where it can be accessible to the public, to be studied and enjoyed under such reasonable regulations as may be made by Congress, or by the authority to whom Congress may delegate the control of the Congressional Library.

Now, Mr. President, if we say that by reason of the fact that a man has been eminent in life, that he has been——

[Mr. HOAR spoke privately to Mr. BACON.]

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, we can not hear what is being said.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, Senators can not be heard.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I thought, if the Senator from Georgia will pardon me, that it was not improper under the circumstances to make a suggestion to the Senator who was speaking.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Massachusetts desires to suggest an amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia if he will allow me to suggest an amendment which will probably remove his objection and save the time of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the joint resolution, in line 5, where it says, "communicated to him by the following letter, on the terms and conditions therein stated," by making it read, "except that the collection shall be known as the Gardiner Greene Hubbard collection," instead of giving the name to a part of the building. Of course that will require the lady's consent to the modification I have proposed.

Mr. BACON. There is another condition here which I had not spoken of, which is a most important one, a more important one really than that which has already been considered. Of course I am perfectly willing, as I said in the beginning, that the collection shall be received, and that it shall be taken into the Library, and that it may be known by that name; but there is another condition that we are equally bound by, and I suggest it to the Senator from Massachusetts:

> Accompanying the collection is a bust of Mr. Hubbard, by Gaetano Trentanove, which I desire may be kept in a suitable place in the gallery.

That is also a condition. How many men would give a million dollars to have their busts put into that building, to be kept there for all time?

Mr. HOAR. There are the busts of nine persons on the outside of that building now, saying nothing of a very considerable number of statues. There are two busts of recently deceased citizens of one small town.

Mr. BACON. I am aware of that fact; at least I am aware of the fact that there are busts there. I did not know that there were busts of two from one town placed there. But that is not the point, Mr. President.

Mr. MILLS. It ought not to have been done either. I have criticised that all along.

Mr. BACON. Even conceding, which some people do not, the propriety of that, the question is whether we ought to accept a donation from anyone on such a condition. I certainly do not in any manner desire to cast any reflection upon the entire propriety of placing this bust, as well as any other bust, there; but the question is as to the propriety of accepting a donation from anyone, I care not who he may be or how high he may be, accompanied with a condition that his bust shall go into that Library building. I do not care if it was an ex-President of the United States or the General Commanding the Army; I care not who it is; there ought never to be accepted as a gift to the Library anything coupled with a condition that a bust of the party or of anybody else shall be placed in the building. In what way can we concede it in this instance and deny it in others?

The Senator from Massachusetts has suggested that this discussion is not a pleasant one. I certainly desire no personal reflection upon Mrs. Hubbard. There is no question but that she is a most estimable lady and that her husband was all that the Senator from Massachusetts states he was. I can not be too emphatic in saying that the objection which I make to this donation upon the conditions stated I would make to a similar proposition coming from the representative of any man who ever lived in this country. I think it is wrong in principle, and therefore I suggest that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will not of itself be sufficient.

Of course I am only one Senator here. I do not know how many may agree with me about this matter, but so far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing that the collection shall be received. Of course it will be known by the name of Mr. Hubbard. I am perfectly willing that it shall be kept in the Library, that it shall be assigned to a place in the Library.

Mr. CULLOM. And that it shall be called the Hubbard collection?

Mr. BACON. And that it shall be called the Hubbard collection. Of course it would be so called. But I am utterly unwilling, as to this collection or any other collection, that there shall be a precedent set by which anyone who may possibly have the means may convert what is a great public building into a building for the commemoration of the virtues, if you please, of himself or of any man, living or dead.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this proposition is certainly not an uncommon one in the management of any great national collections or any great national libraries. In our own Library here—the Library of Congress, which we are now discussing—there is the great Toner collection, with the portrait of the donor.

Mr. WETMORE. And his bust also.

Mr. LODGE. I am told that his bust also is there. I knew there was a portrait. It is a great collection of Americana, especially relating to Washington. There is a room set aside for the collection, and his bust and portrait are there. The Louvre in Paris is the greatest collection of art and antiquities in the world. There is in it everything that can be imagined. It is the greatest museum undoubtedly in the world with the exception, possibly, of the British Museum. There is in the Louvre one great room given to the collection of Lacaze, a collection of pictures, with his portrait, which was a condition in the will. It is not an uncommon thing. On the contrary, it is usual in great national libraries or in libraries or galleries of any kind where a donor makes a gift of sufficient importance to be of general public value to set it aside as a collection by itself and to place with it as a memorial of the giver his bust or his portrait.

I do not think the nation is likely to be burdened with many such gifts. The fact that we take one great and exceptional gift of books or engravings or something of that kind does not in the least deprive us of the right of discretion and judgment as to others that may come later. I know in the Art Museum at Boston many bequests with conditions like these have been refused where the bequest was considered trivial or was not worth assigning a great place to. Those are things that must be left to the judgment of the managers.

It seems to me that it is not an unreasonable or unusual request that if this great collection is given to the nation a place shall be set aside for it, and that the bust or portrait of the donor shall be placed in the room, not because he was a great man, but because he has given a great gift to the nation and to connect his name with the gift. I, for my part, can see no inappropriateness in it. On the contrary, it seems to me to be in accordance with the well-established practice in other libraries and museums.

Mr. MILLS. I move to recommit the joint resolution to the Committee on the Library.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 20, noes 18; no quorum voting.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No quorum having voted, the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. HOAR and Mr. MILLS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 7, 1898, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 6, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE HOUSE GALLERIES.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the Chair if, under the rules of the House, the Chair can entertain a request for unanimous consent that members may be permitted to seat their families on the floor of the House during the session to-day?

The SPEAKER. The rules of the House expressly forbid the Speaker to entertain any motion from any member or a request for unanimous consent for that purpose.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, Mr. Speaker, as a matter affecting the privileges of the House, I desire to say that I have been informed by members of the House that when they tried to seat their families in the galleries to-day they were refused admission, and were told that an unoccupied bench had been reserved by the Assistant Doorkeeper for certain members and their families. I desire to know if the Assistant Doorkeeper of the House, or the Doorkeeper himself, is authorized to partition off the galleries of the House in that manner?

The SPEAKER. He would not without the approval of the Speaker.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I desire to ask if the Speaker has authorized such a change?

The SPEAKER. The Chair authorized the apportioning of a portion of one seat, in addition to that ordinarily set apart for the Speaker.

Mr. BAILEY. And that was done by the Speaker's request?

The SPEAKER. Under the direction of the Chair.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand, of course, that under the rules the Speaker controls the disposition of the galleries. But I was unwilling to see this pass as a matter controlled by the hands of the Doorkeeper or the Assistant Doorkeeper.

The SPEAKER. In no way——

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following resolution, relating to the gallery seats, for reference to the Committee on Rules. I ask that the resolution be referred.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

A MEMBER. Is this resolution in order?

Mr. DOCKERY. It is only offered for reference.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

[The resolution is printed in another part of to-day's RECORD.]

ARMY REORGANIZATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House heretofore made, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] to call up the bill relating to the reorganization of the Army.

Mr. HULL. I call up the bill, Mr. Speaker, providing for the better organization of the line of the Army of the United States.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to ask, Mr. Speaker, if, under the rules of the House, that bill is required to be considered in Committee of the Whole House? It creates additional officers.

Mr. HULL. The order was that it would be considered in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this bill has been made a special order for to-day——

Mr. BAILEY. I understand that; but it is also subject, as I understand it, to the rules as to where it shall be considered.

Mr. HULL. My recollection is, and it was understood in the House, that it would be considered in the House. The agreement was made by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the special order merely fixed to-day for the consideration of the bill. However, the RECORD will show that fact.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, exactly what the request was, but the order was for the consideration of the bill, and did not go so far as the gentleman insists. It did not take the bill from the consideration of the House or relieve it from the points of order to which it may be subjected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read the order of the House made on the occasion referred to:

On motion of Mr. HULL, by unanimous consent, it was ordered that on Wednesday, April 6, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the bill (H. R. 9253) for the better organization of the line of the Army of the United States shall be considered in the House.

Mr. HULL. That was the request I made—to be considered in the House.

Mr. BAILEY. Is that the RECORD or the Journal from which you read?

The SPEAKER. The Journal.

Mr. MCMILLIN. While I make no point at this time upon the statement, still I desire it to be understood by the House that this consent was not given, as I understood it. I was specially looking to the enactment of the bill and should not have consented to any request which prohibited its consideration in the Committee of the Whole. The request was not stated, as I understood it, by the gentleman who made the request, in that way.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The RECORD does not sustain the statement of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HULL. The request that it should be considered in the House?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; the gentleman is mistaken. The RECORD shows the statement was put in this way:

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put it in that way, although it is the same thing. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the bill be taken up, as a special order, on Wednesday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, not to interfere with any report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

To this there was no objection.

Mr. HULL. I ask to have the first request I made read, which shows this bill was to be considered in the House.

Mr. SAYERS. But, Mr. Speaker, what the Chair has read was the request submitted by the Speaker to the House, and to which the consent was given.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Otherwise there would have been objection.

Mr. SAYERS. Consent was given to the request in the form in which it was submitted by the Speaker, not otherwise. Mr. Speaker, I desire——

Mr. HULL. The first request that was made expressly stated "in the House," and I think the RECORD will so show it. The second was a statement by the Chair practically that he would state it again.

Mr. MAGUIRE. But which one did the House act on?

The SPEAKER. That is the Journal of the House. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] is recognized.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I was paying particular attention to the request of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], and I heard no such request as he now claims was made, because I should have objected to it if I had heard it.

Mr. COX. A request for what?

Mr. SAYERS. That the matter be considered in the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I can make the same statement, because my attention was especially called to it with a view of requiring its consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDERSON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Does not the Journal settle this question absolutely?

The SPEAKER. The Journal settles the question.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then I demand the regular order.

Mr. SAYERS. It ought not to settle it against the fact.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] is recognized.

Mr. HULL. I yield a minute for the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS] to read what the RECORD does say.

Mr. PERKINS. On page 3901 is the following:

Mr. HULL. My proposition does not limit it to two hours; but it is that it shall be taken up and considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But, Mr. Speaker, the House is bound by the proposition that the Speaker submitted to the House, and not by the request of the member.

The SPEAKER. The House is bound by its Journal.
Mr. McMILLIN. But the Journal turns out to be erroneous.
Mr. HULL. No.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized.
Mr. BAILEY. Before the gentleman proceeds——
Mr. McMILLIN. The Journal having been approved, I think probably we have no remedy.
Mr. BAILEY. Before the gentleman proceeds I desire to call the attention of the gentleman and the attention of the Chair to the fact that the Speaker stated the request in these words:

The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 9253 shall be in order after the reading of the Journal on Wednesday morning. Is there objection?

The gentleman from Delaware [Mr. HANDY] objected. Then the gentleman from Iowa renewed his motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill. Then, after a conference with the gentleman from Delaware and others, I myself requested the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] to repeat his request, which he did. And it seems to me—I myself do not think it is very material, because I do not think that we on this side desire to engage in any debate in the committee which would not be permissible in the House on this bill; but I thought, inasmuch as there was greater latitude there than here, perhaps it might take its proper course, which is the usual course.
The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to add that not only does the Journal control, but even if the language used was that which was contended for, as against the Journal of the House, nevertheless, under the ruling of Mr. Carlisle, it would be considered in the House.
Mr. HULL. Before proceeding——
Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, the trouble about that ruling—I am aware that a former Speaker of the House held it—is that very few members examine the Journal, while very many members examine the RECORD; and wherever a variance occurs between the RECORD and the Journal the statement of the Journal is very much more apt to be overlooked than the statement of the RECORD. And I submit that the RECORD would be the safer guide.
Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker——
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] will proceed.
Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, before I proceed I should like to see if we can not arrive at some agreement as to the length of time——
Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker——
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has the floor.
Mr. McRAE. Upon the point——
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa——
Mr. HULL. I should like to see if we can not arrive at some agreement as to the time the general debate shall run. My own impression is that the House would like more time for amendments and for general debate, but if we can come to an agreement for general debate and then for the consideration of the bill for amendments, I should like to have that agreement entered into. Now I will ask that we have three hours for debate and then the balance of the day to consider the bill by paragraphs for amendment, and vote at 5 o'clock.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the general debate be limited to three hours, and that the remainder of the day be employed, or so much as may be necessary, for voting on amendments under the five-minute rule. Is there objection?
Mr. MARSH. I object.
Mr. SULZER. I ask unanimous consent that general debate occupy four hours, two hours on each side.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] asks unanimous consent that the general debate shall continue for four hours, two hours on each side. Is there objection?
Mr. MARSH. I object.
Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the proposition, then, to have four hours of debate has been objected to as well as the proposition for three hours?
The SPEAKER. Objection is made to four hours.
Mr. DOCKERY. I would suggest to the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. Speaker, that this is an exceedingly important measure, and it is well to proceed in the usual way, and after the debate has progressed for a time it is probable that some agreement may be made.
Mr. DINGLEY. But, Mr. Speaker, this being in the House, the gentleman in charge of the bill can move the previous question at any time.
Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly; if he should determine to do so.
Mr. HULL. But to move for the previous question would cut off amendments, and I am anxious to preserve the right of the House for amendment.
Mr. HENDERSON. Let us go ahead.
Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the bill for the better organization of the Army seems to have aroused antagonism in the country more on the line of what is called in our States the National Guard than on any other line; and that, I think, from a mistaken idea. The bill deals only with the Regular Army. In the discussion of the bill as to what the Federal Government recognizes, under the title of the States as National Guard, by that of militia, I shall refer to what we all understand as the Guard, as the militia of the country.
It has been assumed, Mr. Speaker, that this bill if enacted into law will destroy the militia of the different States of the United States. I have had letters shown to me in the last two days, written by prominent officers of the militia or Guard, as you please, to their Representatives on this floor, stating that if what is known as the Hull bill passed it will absolutely destroy the National Guard of the country, and that hereafter no officer in the Guard or militia will have any opportunity for promotion or distinction in any of the wars that may come to the United States.
Mr. Speaker, if I believed that I would not advocate the passage of the bill. If I believed that it would deprive patriotic citizens of this country of the right to bear arms in State organizations, mustered originally by the governors, and mustered into the Federal service by United States officers, as they were during our last war, I would not advocate the passage of the bill. I do not recognize the Army of the United States as the great fighting power of the nation. It is or should be always organized and receive the first fire of an enemy.
I do not recognize the National Guard as representing the great fighting power of the Republic of the United States. It is well organized and effective as far as it goes. With only a small standing army, with only a small force as organized and drilled militia, both would amount to absolutely nothing in any great war. Back of both these small organizations stands the great patriotic citizenship of the United States, ready to enroll itself under the banner of the Republic and fight for the defense of their Government. There is the strength of the Republic, and to make it effective the organization should be perfect. This bill does not interfere, it does not change in any particular the law as it now exists as to mustering into the service of the United States all the volunteer troops that may be called for by the President. I grant you it does do this: It makes a larger regimental organization, extends in case of war our peace footing to a war footing, and makes the armies of the United States compare in organization and efficiency with the best armies of the world. You gentlemen must realize this fact, that with the change in firearms, with the modern improvements in engines of war, it would be murder to send the troops of the United States, either the Regular Army or the volunteer forces, into battle with the organization now provided for by law.
It may startle some of you gentlemen to know that this great Republic of ours has an army organization that is absolutely obsolete in all the civilized nations of the world. Absolutely obsolete! When we last had occasion to use the Army in regimental form, we went under that organization into action touching elbows in close order. You remember that we went as near as three or four or five hundred yards of each other and stood there shooting at the opposing ranks, and not certain to kill a man at 500 yards. To-day, with the modern organization, with modern firearms, you have extended formation and you have a space between every man. You have a single rank.
It is more like what we called the old skirmish line during the war, but not so distended; and it would be, as I said before, simply murder to require the armies of the United States to go into battle under the present laws of the United States. It will make fewer officers. That is true. It may deprive some men of the opportunity of being colonels. That may be. How many? If this bill passes, the regiments of the Regular Army and of the volunteers mustered into the United States service will be larger in numbers, and of course it will not require so many regiments to organize a given number of troops. The number of men in a company can be considered when the bill is being amended.
So far as the National Guard is concerned, if there is war of any consequence every man that is now a colonel of a regiment will have an opportunity to enlist with his regiment and be commissioned as a colonel if the governor of his State will grant him that commission. But the first shock would come upon the Regular Army. Why should it not? Do you know, under the present law and your faulty organization, if you have a war the President of the United States can more than double your Army as it is to-day?
He can not change its organization, but he can double its effective force. You are now on a peace footing with 2,610 men; every regiment of infantry under the present law would double its force, your cavalry would have one-third added to it and your artillery would practically double its force, so your Army would be more than doubled. The limitation to 25,000 enlisted men was made on an appropriation bill without repealing the provisions as to maximum and minimum of a company. When more troops are authorized by Congress can not the troops be filled to the maximum?

Mr. DOCKERY. Does not this bill in effect provide service for the surplus officers of the Army?

Mr. HULL. It will not unless there is war.

Mr. DOCKERY. In the event of war, that would prevent the enlistment of volunteer officers——

Mr. HULL. Not a bit of it.

Mr. DOCKERY. The volunteers would be required to enlist in the Regular Army.

Mr. HULL. I will come to that in a moment. I will say further that if the object is simply to commission officers you ought to cut the present regiments down one-half, and then you would have twice as many volunteer officers to come in. I do not conceive that that is the object of Congress in legislation—to see how many places it can provide for any class of people in any line of public service, but this is not any radical change in sections 1 and 2. Suppose you adopt the first two sections, and if the House desires, leave the number of men you can have in time of war to the present number provided by law.

The only additional officers it makes are for two additional companies of infantry, no more than that in any line, the two additional companies of infantry, and if you have in addition to these two additional companies of infantry on a war footing you come to this point that it is only the second lieutenants that the Government are paying for and supporting now who are not assigned. What are we paying the officers for, paying them until they are 64 years of age and then putting them on the retired list and keeping them until they die? Simply as ornamental? We are paying them because we want trained defenders of the Union to respond to the call for arms whenever the country is assailed. Should they not first of all be put to the front instead of the men from civil life who support themselves?

During our last war there was no one thing of more injury to the service of the United States, and undoubtedly to the Confederate army, than the fact that we had a constant formation of new regiments instead of filling up the old regiments and putting them where they would do the most good. In the last war the regiments that went out first became mere skeletons of regiments. Many of them were less than 300 men, with a full complement of officers, and when there was a call for additional troops, instead of filling up those regiments the Government of the United States gave permission to organize new regiments, with new colonels and new officers and left the old ones in a condition not to render effective service to their country. It cost the Government millions of dollars and prolonged the war.

I do not believe it is patriotism, I do not believe it is right, for the Government of the United States to legislate simply on the line of how many officers it can get, but it is right to legislate on the line of how we can best promote the efficiency of our Army and protect the people of the United States in case of danger.

Mr. Speaker, further than that, it does not provide in this bill for the creation of a single additional regiment of the Regular Army. It does not provide in this bill for the creation of any organization to absorb the patriotic citizens of this country. It does provide for the expansion, and I concede to you that when we consider the bill under the provision for amendments, it may be a question whether that expansion is not made too great under this bill. I confess my original idea was that it should not have gone beyond 200 at the outside.

But the bill provides that in time of war, or when war is declared by Congress, rather, because we have amended the bill, and these companies are recruited to the number of 150, they are on a war footing, and the President of the United States in his discretion is not to expand them beyond that number a single man. If you limit it to that, the bill would be of infinite value to the people of the United States. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that this is not a new thing. I want the Clerk to read for me, in order to save my voice as much as possible, a letter from General Sherman, written in 1876.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., September, 1876.

SIR: In compliance with the resolution adopted by the commission at its first session, August, 1876, I have the honor to submit my individual views and opinions of the matter confided to our action.

* * * * * * *

Each regiment would * * * contain, for a peace establishment, 54 officers and 736 enlisted men, aggregating 790; or the

10 regiments of cavalry equal	120 companies equal	540 officers and	7,360 men.
20 regiments of infantry equal	240 companies equal	1,080 officers and	14,720 men.

Aggregating, officers and men, 27,650.

To increase to the war standard, simply add to each company 1 sergeant, 1 corporal, and 50 privates, which would result as follows:

10 regiments of cavalry equal	120 companies equal	540 officers and	13,600 men.
20 regiments of infantry equal	240 companies equal	1,080 officers and	27,200 men.

To further increase for war purposes, add four new companies to each battalion, and we have—

5 regiments artillery equal	120 companies equal	510 officers and	13,700 men.
10 regiments cavalry equal	240 companies equal	1,020 officers and	27,400 men.
20 regiments infantry equal	480 companies equal	2,040 officers and	54,800 men.

The Germans now use companies as large as 250 men, so that a battalion of eight companies numbers 2,000 men. Assuming that as the maximum, we will have—

5 regiments equal 15 battalions of artillery, equal	30,000
10 regiments equal 30 battalions of cavalry, equal	60,000
20 regiments equal 60 battalions of infantry, equal	120,000
Making an army of	210,000

On a minimum or peace basis of 27,650. Thus an effective and well-organized army of over 200,000 can be created promptly "without the least confusion or disorder," fulfilling all the conditions of Mr. Calhoun's second great principle, which he regarded as of more national importance than the first.

On considering any paper organization it is safe to assume that about one-third are usually absent. This seems a large proportion, but it is the result of experience extending back for centuries. Good discipline and good administration diminish this ratio, while bad discipline and worse administration increase it largely. The usual causes of diminished ranks are wounds and sickness, furloughs and leaves of absence, confinement by way of punishment, details for cooking, for care of sick, as teamsters, care and distribution of supplies, detachments for escorts of trains and exposed points along the routes of supply, etc.

* * * * * * *

With great respect, your obedient servant,

W. T. SHERMAN, General.

Hon. J. D. CAMERON,
Secretary of War, and President of the Commission for the Reorganization, etc., of the Army.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the House has paid attention to the reading of that letter, two things that I want to call attention to have been brought out. One is that with any army, no matter how organized, the experience of the past has shown that one-third of the men are always absent from duty. That seems like a very large percentage, yet it is the experience of all the armies of the past in any considerable wars; and if you have the present organization on a war footing, with 101 men to a company, it will result, with the fighting force in the best conditions, that you will have in your companies on the average less than 66 men. The modern formation, as I said a while ago, makes it absolutely imperative to pass some law on this subject if we are to have war.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman has spoken of the new formation made necessary by the new weapons—the attenuated lines and the lengthened lines. Now, will he tell us what would be the space occupied in line of battle by one of his full companies of 250 men, to be commanded by three officers under the conditions contemplated in this bill?

Mr. HULL. In the first place, I do not believe there would ever be in one company a line of 250 men, although the bill would authorize that in the discretion if passed as it is now.

Mr. HEPBURN. I am asking my question with reference to the bill as now before us.

Mr. HULL. A line of that kind would take as much ground practically as one of our old regiments.

Mr. HEPBURN. And be commanded by three officers?

Mr. HULL. No; by a captain and three lieutenants, with an increased number of noncommissioned officers, the captain being mounted.

But, Mr. Speaker, when we come to consider amendments, we can better discuss the size of the company that should be authorized. What I want to call attention to now is another feature that the committee has ingrafted on the bill. It provides for three battalions——

Mr. RAY of New York. Before the gentleman takes up that subject, I should like to ask him a question. It has been stated that if this proposed bill should become a law the men of the National Guard would, under its operation, be taken to fill up the regiments of the Regular Army, while the officers of the National Guard would be left at home, without commands. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether that is true.

Mr. HULL. In reply to the gentleman, I will say that I hold in my hand an editorial from a Philadelphia paper, purporting to quote from an interview with me published in the New York Sun, in which that idea is put forward. I want to say to the gentleman from New York and to the House that I never had an interview of that kind, that no utterance that I have made to any correspondent of the New York Sun or any other paper embraced any such idea. I wish to say further that that would not be the effect of the bill, unless on the first call for troops the men would prefer to volunteer in the Regular Army instead of going into the National Guard. There is nothing in this bill that contemplates any such thing as absorbing the National Guard, so called, into the Regular Army. There is not a line in the bill that justifies any such assumption as that.

Mr. RAY of New York. Then, to make the matter clear, let me put the question in this form: Is it true that under your bill the organization in the State, if it desires, may remain intact and if it volunteers as an organization go to the front under its own officers?

Mr. HULL. That is absolutely true. I should like the gentleman to repeat his question, so that all the members of the House may hear it, and I trust we may have order for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. If members conform to the rule and address the Chair, a larger number of the members of the House will be likely to hear what is said. The moment the remarks of members become dialogues they cease to be debate.

Mr. HULL. I think I understood the gentleman's question. Now let me answer it.

A MEMBER. The House did not understand it.

Mr. RAY of New York. I will repeat it, so that the House may hear it. I had no desire, of course, to interrupt the gentleman; but there are some points in connection with this bill which I wished to have explained fully in order that there might be no misunderstanding, and I know that the chairman is able to give such explanation. It was for that purpose and no other that I rose.

My question is this: Under the provisions of this bill may the men be taken from the regiments of the National Guard in the various States and put into the ranks of the Regular Army, while the officers of the National Guard are left at home without commands? I think that covers my question.

Mr. HULL. In reply to that question, I will say that the question whether a member of the National Guard will stay with his command or go into the Regular Army is left absolutely with him, as it is with every other man who may volunteer.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. What is the meaning, then, of section 5?

Mr. HULL. I do not care to discuss that matter just now, but for the benefit of the gentleman from Michigan, I will answer his question. The meaning of section 5 is that if upon the call men from different States do volunteer and go into the Regular Army, and afterwards there should be a draft, the State that has furnished a certain number of men to the Regular Army shall have as much credit for those that go into the Regular Army as for those that go into the volunteers. That is all that section means.

Mr. DOCKERY. Now, will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. HULL. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will not press his question now. I want first to answer fully my friend from New York.

As the law now stands, if there is a call for troops and the President, under the present law, is authorized to expand the regiments to a war footing, there is nothing to determine whether the recruits shall go into the Volunteer or the Regular Army. It rests entirely and solely with the party himself. The bill does not in any respect change his privilege in that regard. Of course, if a man in the National Guard wants to go into the Regular Army, I should not favor any law which provides that he should not have and exercise that privilege. And if a man is not in either the National Guard or the Regular Army, and wants to enlist and go out with the State troops in his own State, I would not favor a law to prevent it. It is a right that he ought to exercise; it is the right of each citizen to select his service and to determine the character of that service for himself.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another question presented by this bill. I have had a great number of letters during the last year or two asking me, if we should expand the Regular Army in the manner here proposed, whether we ought not at the same time to expand the militia, or the National Guard, as it is called. Now, do not gentlemen on the floor of the House know that the law as it stands to-day requires that the National Guard of the States is to be organized and must conform as nearly as practicable to all of the requirements of the Regular Army of the United States in case of war?

And yet we have a number of National Guardsmen all over the country who have been, by letters and otherwise, urging me for the last two years, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, to secure a change of the law and to provide that in case of war the Regular Army should be made to conform to the National Guard organization. Why? Because the National Guard, in many of the States of the Union, is a better organized system of military force than the Regular Army of the United States is. They have kept up with the times. We are behind the times in our organization.

They have modern tactics and modern drill, while under the law of the United States your War Department could not even publish the tactics of the United States Army, providing for the modern system of drill and the modern methods. Why? Notwithstanding the fact that all of these are compiled and ready and waiting to be printed, yet if they are published without a change of the present law, that Department would be guilty of violating the laws of the country. Therefore there is strong reason, on every ground that can be suggested, for making the change in the organization of the Army proposed here, so as to make it conform to the needs of a great Republic, and make it conform to the change in improved conditions of the military forces in the various States of the Union and all civilized countries of the world.

If, Mr. Speaker, we should have a war and should change our system to the three-battalion organization, every National Guard of every State and every soldier recruited for the Regular Army in every State throughout the Union will conform to the organization of the Regular Army and will go into battle with a harmonious organization, precisely the same in all respects as the National Guards of the States and the Regular Army or the volunteer service of the United States. Our organization now is defective and is far from being harmonious. That is a fact which no one will deny.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. STEELE. I understood the gentleman to say a few moments ago, in discussing this matter, that the rule should apply both ways, namely, that a militiaman should be privileged to go into the Regular Army and that the soldier in the Regular Army might go into the militia in case of war.

Mr. HULL. Oh, no; the gentleman misunderstood me. I said that the individual should have the right to exercise his judgment in this matter before enlisting. He has the right to enlist, in other words, where he chooses.

Mr. STEELE. That is undoubtedly true.

Mr. HULL (continuing). But the man in the Regular Army or in the State troops, after he is mustered into the service of the United States, has no privilege or right to change his service after that.

Mr. STEELE. And certainly should not have.

Mr. HULL. He has not, under existing law, and should not have. As I have said, this is only to make the United States service conform to the best service in the States.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. The truth of the matter is the States have gone far ahead in this regard.

Mr. HULL. That is correct. The United States regulations and system of organization demand this change.

Mr. RAY of New York. Will the gentleman from Iowa not make the point plain to the House to which I referred a moment ago, because there is a great deal of objection, as I understand it, made to the bill on that account? Gentlemen say that if a company of the National Guard in any of the States wants to go into the service of the United States as a body, there is no way by which it can do so without losing its organization and losing its own officers. In other words, they would have to go into the service of the United States as individual members and without their organization or their officers.

Mr. HULL. Do you mean in the Regular Army or the reserves?

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes; I mean in the Regular Army.

Mr. HULL. If any body of men want to go into the Regular Army, they go in as individuals.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is true.

Mr. HULL. They do under the law as it stands to-day.

Mr. DOCKERY. And as privates, too.

Mr. HULL. They go in as individuals under the law to-day. And let me say further, gentlemen, that you can not pass a law that lets people go into the Army as an organization. Let me ask you gentlemen who are so fearful on this point a question. Suppose there is a call for a hundred thousand men. Suppose there is a call for 50,000 men. Under your present law you can expand the Regular Army more than half of that amount by individual enlistment. You apportion the other 25,000 men to the different States. Do you claim that your regiments of the National Guard go in as regimental organizations under the present law?

Mr. DOCKERY. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. HULL. I will tell you how you go in and always did go in. A requisition is made on the governor for so many troops. Suppose in my State of Iowa it is for one regiment. The Government of the United States has not one thing to say as to the men accepted till the regiment is organized by the governor of the State and tendered to the United States to be mustered into the service. He may select companies from different regiments of the Guard.

Mr. DOCKERY. But right there——

Mr. HULL. The gentleman will have his own time.

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. HULL. I ask the gentleman to wait a minute longer.

Mr. MAHON. Then I will wait.

Mr. HULL. The governor of that State organizes State regiments, and it is the same under this bill that it is under the present law. The present law leaves all these matters as at the present time.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. And he officers the regiment.

Mr. HULL. Organizes and officers the regiment. Organization means enlisting the men and commissioning the officers. The governor organizes the regiment, and, as I said, he may not take all of any one regiment of National Guards. We have in my State two brigades of National Guards. The governor of Iowa could take one company from one regiment and another from another, and under the law as it stands to-day he could commission a man as colonel who is not in the Guards at all. The law does not say the governor shall in time of war commission the colonel who is now commanding a regiment of National Guards. The law does not recognize that. The National Guard of the different States is organized for State service only.

Mr. MAHON. Now will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. MAHON. I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa, Why not recruit your Regular Army under this bill, as you always have recruited it, wherever you can get the men, and credit them to no particular State?

Mr. HULL. I have no objection to that at all.

Mr. MAHON. Do that and then strike out section 5 from this bill, and I shall have no objection to the bill.

Mr. HULL. I have no objection to striking out section 5.

Mr. MAHON. It ought to go out.

Mr. HULL. I am perfectly willing that it should go out. I want simply to say in answer to that that when this bill was before the committee we were anxious to have it so framed that it would have the unanimous support of the committee. I do not regard this section 5 as one that the committee are particularly in love with, but every member of the committee indorsed the bill as it was reported. The senior member on the Republican side after the chairman is chairman of the Committee on the Militia [Mr. MARSH]. He took an active part in framing the bill, and I do not believe that he would have been willing, nor do I believe that any member of the committee would have been willing, to frame a bill that would cripple, much less destroy, the National Guards.

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MARSH. I want to say to the gentleman that when I urged and voted to report that bill to the House I made the distinct statement that I wanted to get it out of the committee into the House, where it could have decent consideration. It is there now. I never committed myself to that bill.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I have the floor, and the gentleman will have it later. He raised no objection to the bill in committee, and I assumed he was heartily in favor of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. MARSH. He yielded to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. HULL. I want to say again that every member of the committee voted for the bill. The record of the committee will bear that out. I had no idea that I was sticking a pin into my friend from Illinois in making a little statement that was intended to be complimentary to him; but I will say that a large number of the amendments offered to this bill were offered by the gentleman from Illinois, and not a single amendment that he offered was rejected that I can now recall; not one.

Now, as to the economy of it. It does in time of peace add twenty-five majors to the Regular Army. It makes two battalions out of eight companies that are now in active service in the infantry arm of the Army. It provides for an increase, then, of just twenty-five majors in the infantry. There is no increase in the cavalry and no increase in the artillery in time of peace. It divides the eight companies into two battalions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, at the very most it will cost $87,000 a year increased expenditures in time of peace. That is a fair statement of the case. We have the promotion in the second lieutenancies and up the line to senior captains to be major. That will make a little increase in the expenditures, as the majors are increased by promotions brought about in the bill. In the next class that we will have graduated there will be more unassigned lieutenants than enough to make up the twenty-five now promoted to first lieutenants by the promotion of senior captains to be majors. Why, we pay them now. We pay our captains, first and second lieutenants now, and you have a difference in pay in the senior captains' and majors' pay which amounts to less than $2,000 a year; and that is a fairer proposition than the other.

Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but the committee was so anxious to economize in this matter, that under the circumstances this committee did not provide for three majors even in time of war. It utilizes in the three battalions the lieutenant-colonels, that is, one lieutenant-colonel and two majors in the infantry, and one lieutenant-colonel and three majors for the cavalry and for the artillery. That would be leaving them as they are in the present law. So that we have cut the expenses of this measure, gentlemen, to the very lowest point possible in order to get an efficient army organization. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to reserve a part of my time——

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HULL. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I would like to know, under this bill, if the National Guard or the State militia can be utilized in case of war until the 104,000 provided for in the bill have been supplied?

Mr. HULL. That would be a question with the President of the United States. He would have a discretion as to whether the number of men in a company should exceed 150 enlisted men.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Then one more question, which the gentleman can answer at the same time. In the event that we should have war, which would be unfortunate, and a company were organized, and that company desired to select their own officers, would they be permitted to do so?

Mr. HULL. They would not, if they went into the Regular Army, and never did.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Is it not required that you should fill up the 104,000 before you can use the National Guard or the militia?

Mr. HULL. The answer to that question comes when we come to the consideration of the companies, and is answered already. When that is reached, there is the proper place to limit the discretion of the President. Under the present law, if we do not change it a particle, every company of infantry can be raised by the State, and every company of infantry is on the full quota of a war footing which is now on a peace footing; and after the President fills up the Regular Army regiments, and if there were no need for any other troops, there would be no call for any action by the States. Nor would there be under the present law.

Mr. OTEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HULL. I will.

Mr. OTEY. At the end of the war what becomes of this increased number of officers?

Mr. HULL. The last section shows what is proposed, and we will reach that in the discussion of the bill. They are not mustered out, I will say to the gentleman; and that is one reason that we do not provide an extra major, and we want to reduce the number of the officers as much as possible. Section 9 provides that they shall be absorbed and transferred, but not mustered out. But the bill will be a great saving in officers' salaries. I will say to my friend from Virginia that if we should provide that every officer should be mustered out, there would not be a man in the Regular Army who would accept a commission for the two extra companies provided for, because he is now on the regular force. He knows he is where he is to be taken care of during his life, and would refuse service in any of the extra companies.

Mr. OTEY. You muster out all the privates, but you absorb all the officers by transferring them.

Mr. HULL. How many do you have? There will be no promotion unless you need them.

Mr. OTEY. What are you going to do with the supernumerary ones?

Mr. HULL. The supernumeraries will be taken care of as they are taken care of now. The second lieutenants that we have as they are graduated are awaiting assignments. They are on the pay roll of the Government; they are not mustered out because there is no place to put them at work.

Mr. BRUMM. This bill will increase the supernumeraries, will it not?

Mr. HULL. At the close of the war; I think so.

Mr. BRUMM. Then your answer is not pertinent.

Mr. HULL. Yes; my answer is.

Mr. WILSON. As this bill has a limitation, should it be necessary to have more soldiers where will they come from? Will they not come from the volunteers of the various States?

Mr. HULL. I have answered that several times. If there are more troops than the Regular Army needs, they will come from apportionment of States, but when we come to consider the bill by sections, if the size of the companies is considered too large, you can leave out the increase, keep the Army as it is now, and still keep up the improved organization. I want to call attention to one feature——

Mr. BELKNAP. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. BELKNAP. In connection with what you have just said, if we do not expand the Regular Army to 104,000, keep the companies at the maximum now allowed by law, 101 men, then that gives the militia and volunteers who want to fight an opportunity to fight.

Mr. HULL. Not until the Regular Army is filled.

Mr. BELKNAP. If you keep the companies at a maximum of 101 men, you do not take in so many men in the Regular Army.

Mr. HULL. Clearly not.

Mr. BELKNAP. You still obtain your new organization.

Mr. HULL. If you keep the men the same and pass the first and second sections, you do. But if you do not pass the bill, you do not.

Mr. BELKNAP. I am in favor of the improved and modern organization, but I want the militia and volunteers who desire an opportunity to fight to have that chance. I do not want them to be shut out by the Regular Army.

Mr. HULL. I want to call attention to the fact that if we increase the Army to 104,000 men it would be a saving to the Government of more than $3,000,000 a year in pay of officers.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Before the gentleman goes to another point I would like to have him explain what he means by skeleton companies in time of peace.

Mr. HULL. When the law went into effect limiting the Regular Army to so many men, the War Department issued regulations under that law skeletonizing, as they called it, two companies of each regiment of infantry and two companies of cavalry. That simply means that the officers are assigned to a command, but there are no enlisted men. This bill does not change that at all in time of peace, but it does provide that in time of war the skeletonized companies shall be recruited up to their full strength, or whatever the President determines to be the strength he desires, and at the conclusion of the war they are mustered out entirely.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is that the condition now?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then two-tenths of the line officers are without command.

Mr. HULL. Not so many as that, because not all of the regiments are skeletonized.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HULL. Yes; but I would like to get through, so as to reserve some of my time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman be willing to accept an amendment providing that the increase shall not occur until the available strength of the National Guard shall be given an opportunity to enter into the service?

Mr. HULL. I do not know as I should accept that. I am not authorized to. The time will come, if we get through with the general debate and a reasonable time given so that amendments can be offered, when the gentleman can offer this one and the House can determine whether they will accept it or not.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will you express your views upon it?

Mr. HULL. I should say this: That the infantry companies ought to be increased to 150 men, but I am not tenacious as to that, as the battalion organization is to my mind the most important feature of the bill. They would not be full, probably, under that. The War Department gave me a statement of all the armies of the world, showing that in Germany, France, Russia, Austria, and Italy they have the basis of 250 or more men to the company, and that the artillery companies have more than is provided in the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Do not you think that a privilege or preference ought to be given to the National Guard?

Mr. HULL. Most assuredly. I want to ask gentlemen if they believe that in any war of any considerable size the Regular Army and the National Guards combined will furnish troops necessary for the defense of the Republic?

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. What is the sum total of officers carried in the bill on a war footing?

Mr. HULL. I will give the gentleman that.

Mr. BINGHAM. Seven hundred or more?

Mr. HULL. Seven hundred or more.

Mr. BINGHAM. Where do you get all the officers?

Mr. HULL. We get the second lieutenants first for the Regular Army from West Point, and then they are promoted from the ranks of the Regular Army after examination.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then the commissioned officers will come from noncommissioned officers and enlisted men now in the service?

Mr. HULL. Very largely.

Mr. BINGHAM (continuing). As against the trained officers in the volunteer force, those trained in the militia of the country——

Mr. HULL. Not at all.

Mr. BINGHAM. Show me where.

Mr. HULL. They would still go into State troops.

Mr. BINGHAM. But not into this body of men.

Mr. HULL. No; they would not be in the Regular Army. My friend is assuming that this bill is legislating for troops outside of the Regular Army, whereas in this bill we are legislating for the Regular Army and the Regular Army only.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is it not a fact that before any troops can come into the service you must have 104,000 men in the Regular Army?

Mr. HULL. No, sir; that is not the fact. It would be a fact if the President under this bill filled it up to the maximum. As I repeatedly said, when we reach the size of the companies we can come at that more properly than in general debate. I am more interested in the reorganization of the Army than I am in the size of the company. I am more interested in the three-battalion organization than I am in the size of the company.

Mr. BINGHAM. I simply wanted to know where you are to get your commissioned officers.

Mr. HULL. From the Regular Army. But that does not affect what we understand to be the State troops. As I have said repeatedly, if the size of the companies should be deemed too large; if, in the opinion of the House, the proposed size of the companies would increase the Regular Army to a greater extent than it ought to be increased in time of war, it will be an easy matter, when we come to consider the amendments to the bill, to fix the size of the companies in a way to correspond to the wishes of the House without interfering with the great cardinal principle of the bill, which is that of reorganization.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ROBBINS. Before the gentleman takes his seat, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Twelve minutes.

Mr. HULL. Then I must reserve all my time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] in opposition to the bill.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Speaker, this bill in many respects has my approbation. So far as it provides for the reorganization of the Army so that there may be three battalions to a regiment it follows, in my judgment, the best military opinions of the world. My principal objection to this bill, which I shall consume but a few moments in stating, is that it unduly and unnecessarily increases and enlarges the Regular Army. We now have 42 regiments in the Regular Army, 25 of infantry and 10 of cavalry, and, in view of our recent legislation, 7 regiments of artillery. The number of men in those 42 regiments is by existing law limited to 26,610. This bill provides for the increase of the enlisted men in those 42 regiments to the extent of 78,000 more than we now have. In other words, it proposes to increase the number of enlisted men of the Regular Army in time of war from 26,610 to 105,000, in round numbers.

Now, in the first place, I am opposed to the increase of the Regular Army to any such extent. The policy of European governments is to maintain large standing regular armies. Just the opposite has been the policy of this Republic from the earliest days down to the present time. In all of our wars, foreign and internecine, we have depended upon the citizen soldiery of the country to defend the flag. And, Mr. Speaker, the country has never depended upon them in vain. They have performed fully and completely all the functions of good soldiers. And I am opposed, even in time of war, to the considerable increase here proposed of the regular troops. In case of war, the imminent possibility of which now confronts us, I think it wise to do in the future as we have done in the past—to depend upon the citizen soldiery of the country. [Applause.]

First, allow me to criticise (if I may use that term) the size of the regiments proposed by this bill. Under existing laws, a maximum regiment of infantry consists of about 1,000 men, there being, I believe, 98 enlisted men to the company. That provision of law was enacted years ago, when our formations, regimental and company, were in two ranks, elbows touching elbows. The men were maneuvered in that form, and they were hurled into battle in that form. Under the modern mode of warfare, with the improved guns, etc., that is absolutely done away with; and all the infantry engagements must be in the skirmish-line formation, and the company and regimental formation must be the single-line formation.

This bill proposes to increase the company to 250 enlisted men. True it is not probable that a company would ever go into action with all of that number. Some men would be sick; some men would be out of the ranks.

A MEMBER. The gentleman is speaking of the infantry.

Mr. MARSH. I am speaking of the infantry regiments.

Mr. STEELE. As I know the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] has had a great deal of experince on this subject, I wish to ask him this question: Suppose you should go into the field to-day with a company of 250 volunteers; how many men do you suppose you would have to go into battle in six months or in six weeks?

Mr. MARSH. I may go into that matter after a while. But I will say now that an answer to the question of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] would be largely a matter of speculation.

Mr. STEELE. I am appealing to the gentleman's experience.

Mr. MARSH. I do not suppose the company would go into battle with every man in line. But I think we have a right to expect that the larger portion of it would be in line.

Now, under the present formation, with the present modes of carrying on battles, these men, instead of being in two ranks and touching elbow to elbow, would be in a skirmish line, 6, 8, or 10 feet apart. So that one company of 250 men or 200 men, under the proposed formation and with the present mode of fighting, would occupy more frontage space than a full regiment would under the old sytem. And I say it is a physical impossibility for two, three, or even four company officers to take care of so long a line.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that one of the regiments provided for in this bill, with the formation that the gentleman from Illinois has spoken of, with intervals of even 5 feet, would occupy in line of battle a little more than 4 miles. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I hope you have heard the statement just made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. I have no doubt he has made his computation carefully and that his statement is correct.

This bill provides for 12 of these companies to each regiment and 250 men to a company—that is to say, 3,000 men in a regiment—and my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], who made the computation, says that when a full regiment is in action under the modern mode of warfare, it would occupy a line of 4 miles in length.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am making, as I stated before, no attack whatever on the organization proposed in the pending bill, but I am opposed to the large increase of the enlisted men provided for the Army by this bill. I am opposed to it for two reasons, which I propose to state to the House. One, because it makes these companies and regiments too large to properly handle, and in the second place, because it will cut out all opportunity for the citizen soldiers of the country to take part in the coming war, if we are to have a war.

We have in this country now a National Guard, composed of troops of the various States, numbering, on the 1st day of December last, 104,000 men, well drilled, well equipped, well clothed, well armed, and well able to meet any emergency that might arrive.

Mr. BINGHAM. And well officered.

Mr. MARSH. And well officered. These men are able, anxious, and willing to respond to the call of the country; but if this bill passes, providing for 105,000 regular troops, it will preclude, in my judgment, the possibility, or at least the probability, of these citizen soldiers taking part in actual hostilities in case we should get into a contest, as now seems probable.

Now, sir, as I have said before, it has been the policy of this country to fight its battles with its own citizen soldiery. [Applause.] And I wish to say if we enter upon a war, either now or hereafter, if a war shall become a necessity, as I expect it will in a very few days—if we enter upon that war, we want it to be a popular war; and you never can popularize a war in this country by means of the Regular Army. [Applause.]

You must have the heart of the men, the women, and the children all over the land in its progress and prosecution. [Renewed applause.] And, Mr. Speaker, we will have it if we permit their sons and their brothers to enlist under the banners of the Republic as they have been allowed to do in previous wars which this country has had to meet.

A MEMBER. Will the gentleman explain the uses of the pending bill?

Mr. MARSH. The gentleman asks me to explain what the bill is or what its purposes are.

I think the organization as proposed in the bill is a correct one, that is, the three-battalion organization. As I said a while ago, there are 42 regiments and only 26,600 soldiers in the Regular Army. I think the Regular Army ought to be increased—and that I favor—to 1,000 men to each regiment, thus increasing the aggregate force of the enlisted men in the Army from 26,600 men to 42,000 men, so as to give 1,000 men to each regiment of the Regular Army.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, there are, as I have said, 42 regiments; and I would increase the regular enlisted force of the Army to 42,000 men, and I would not go a man beyond that. That is as large as these regiments ought to be, and will give us all the regular troops that we need. I would adopt, I hope the House will adopt, the organization as proposed in this bill—the three-battalion system, and the proposition further to skeletonize one of the battalions, but retaining the force of officers.

Now, I wish to say that I have no hostility toward the Regular Army. I have the highest respect for the officers and men who are connected with that branch of our service. The officers of the Regular Army of America will compare favorably, and, in my judgment, are superior to those of any other country on the face of the globe. In point of education, in equipment, in gallantry, in skill, they are not excelled, if they are equaled, by any other set of officers on the face of the earth. And, furthermore, Mr. Speaker, if I had the power to do so, I would double the number of cadets at West Point and Annapolis; and when they graduated, if there was no use for them in the Regular Army or in the Navy, I would turn them loose among the people.

It is a good investment of the public money; it is a good thing for the country to educate men for war at all times. [Applause.] But my hostility to this large increase in the enlisted force of the Regular Army is not because of any hostility I have for that organization at all. I love it; I revere it; I respect it with all my heart and all my mind; but I have some respect also for the efficiency of the National Guard—the men and the officers of my own State and other States in this great Union. [Applause.]

I would not ignore them; and yet if you pass this bill providing for 105,000 enlisted men in case of war in the Regular Army, in all probability that number will be all of the men that the Government will need in the coming war, and these men at home, patriotic citizens, who have been devoting themselves largely year after year to the building up of the National Guard in their own States, and taking great pride in their organizations, paying a portion of the expense out of their own private purses to the extent that the National Government has failed to supply such payments, will be entirely prohibited from entering into the service of the United States.

I would give them an opportunity to enter the service of the Government in the event of war, and enable them to enroll themselves in the service of the United States. I would say to the governor of Illinois or the governor of Mississippi, we want two or three regiments from your State; and the governors of the respective States would say we designate the Second or the Third Illinois or Mississippi regiments of the National Guard, as the case may be, to answer the call of the President.

I would give every member of that National Guard who thought, for family reasons or for business reasons, that he could not enter the service of the United States an opportunity to drop out and let some one else take his place; but I would take that regiment into the United States service as the Third Regiment of National Guards of Illinois, and when I got through with them, I would muster them out as the Third Illinois National Guard, and let them go back to Illinois and perpetuate for all time the memories of the regiment and its organization. [Applause.]

By doing that, Mr. Speaker, you encourage the patriotism of the country. By doing that you recognize the patriotic young men of the country, of Mississippi, and of South Carolina, and of Massachusetts, and of Maine, and of California. Why, Mr. Speaker, I had occasion a few days ago, perhaps ten days or two weeks ago, to call upon the Secretary of War and also upon the President to suggest to them that in case of war the National Guard should first be called upon and given an opportunity to volunteer as organizations into the United States service.

That evening the fact that I had called and urged that was stated in the newspapers of the city, and before I retired at night I received a telegram from Los Angeles, Cal., saying that if the President accepted that suggestion, a certain regiment, naming it, 1,200 strong, was ready to respond to the call of the Government. That came from the Pacific Ocean. That is the spirit which animates the National Guard all over this country, and they would feel it an insult to them if we should recruit the Regular Army to a point where it would not be necessary to call upon them for military assistance.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that any action which is taken by this Congress that interferes with or makes provision interfering with the National Guard of the country taking a hand in the coming contest—I say any such effort will be injurious to the patriotic spirit of the country, and will, in my judgment, meet with its condemnation. Now, when we reach that point where amendments will be in order, I propose to offer an amendment to reduce these regiments to 1,000 enlisted men to a regiment and limiting the number of enlisted men in the Regular Army to 42,000 in time of war, inasmuch as there are 42 regiments.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that that amendment will be adopted by this House; and if it is adopted, I want to say that it will be a grand recognition of the magnificent patriotism of the country that is exhibited in every county all over the land by the National Guard organizations. [Applause.] I know of nothing else that I desire to say upon this bill.

How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has thirty-seven minutes remaining.

Mr. MARSH. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, we are upon the threshold of a war. Every man in this House realizes it. It is important that we should start right, and whether in this contest, which seems inevitable, we start with State troops, as we have in the past in times of war, or whether we begin with the Regular Army alone, I say it is of the utmost importance that we start right on this question.

I believe that in the district which I have the honor to represent on this floor we could not raise 100 men for the Regular Army in three months. I believe we could, if need be, raise three regiments of volunteers in twenty-four hours. That is the difference with which the people of Iowa would look upon enlistment in the Regular Army as compared with the volunteer service. The battalion at the Iowa State University has tendered its service to the Government, but they would not enlist in regular regiments.

The State of Iowa has appropriated $500,000 to mobilize and prepare the National Guard for immediate use. The State of New York has appropriated half a million dollars for the same purpose.

Mr. SULZER. I wish to say to the gentleman that the State of New York has appropriated $1,000,000.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman has spoken of New York and Iowa, and I think Ohio and Michigan. Now, is it not a fact that if a war should come and this money should be expended by these States, in the light of the history of the past, will they not come to Congress to get every dollar of that back?

Mr. HILL. They will call upon the Government for it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will they not come here, as they always have done——

Mr. LACEY. I hope so. I have no doubt they will.

Mr. GROSVENOR. As they have for thirty years, and drain the Treasury.

Mr. LACEY. I am not talking about the Treasury. They will not draw from the Treasury any more than they may expend.

Mr. MAHON. You are talking about patriotism.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, there is no question as to the expense. It will have to be borne by the country at large in the end. I only speak of this as showing the speed with which State troops may be mobilized and prepared for the field. The States will put them on a war footing more quickly than can be done in any other way.

Now, I deplore war. I regret that it seems to be inevitable; it is doubtful if it can be avoided with honor; it will probably come soon, but we can get one good thing out of this war. Let us have it. I want to have a controversy arise between the State of Georgia and the State of Iowa as to which regiment got in first in the next fight and which one stayed longest and fought the best after they got in. [Applause.]

It will be a patriotic, a generous, and a noble emulation, Mr. Speaker. There will be a contest between a Maine regiment and a Texas regiment as to which fought the more bravely in battle. In that way you will cement the Union together. [Applause.] I went through Mexico a year or two ago, and, talking with Mexicans there, they said they could whip the whole United States if it were not for Texas. [Laughter.] That was the idea they had about it. Now, they never had met any Iowa troops in Mexico. [Laughter.] Iowa was a thing of the future at the time of the Mexican difficulty.

I hope they never will; but that is the feeling in that country, because they happened to meet the Texas soldiers, and met them first. They met them at San Jacinto and at the Alamo, and it is that State spirit, that pride of State, coupled with national patriotism, that in a war would cement the people together with blood and iron. It would be the only unalloyed good thing that would come out of a war. This bill, in its present form, would provide for a regular standing army large enough to meet the necessities of the contest and deprive us of the patriotic advantage of State competition upon the field of honor.

And that I do not wish to see lost, Mr. Speaker. When you begin in the future to talk about war, people will then say, "What war?" And when we now speak about war, we mean "the" war—the war where we furnished the troops for both sides. The next war will be fought with our troops on only one side, and let the North and let the South and let the East and let the West march side by side in this contest. We can not fill the Regular Army speedily. It is the slowest form of enlistment. We have recruiting flags out now. Are the people flocking to them? Not at all. They are gathering slowly. They await the call for the volunteers.

They are recruiting for the Navy, and the result is they are not getting men with that rapidity which we would like to see, because Americans do not like to enter into a permanent army or navy organization. But when they go into a State force, into the volunteers, and come back home in a few months or in a year, they go back and dissolve into the common masses of the people of the country. They immediately take their places in the front ranks in civil life. It has always been so. We will see some of them in Congress two years from now, at the end of the next war. The people never forget their defenders. The men who enlist in the State troops come from all the avenues of life; and if a locomotive goes off the track, they call for an engineer, and he steps out of the ranks. In case of an accident to an engine or machine, they call for a machinist, and he steps to the front and takes his place.

The Regular Army is not recruited in this way. It is recruited in the cities from men without homes, without family ties, and it is recruited almost solely from that class; and when it becomes necessary to disband the organization, the men have no place to go. They go back, many of them, to a wandering course instead of returning to the avenues of civil life. The opportunities of promotion are nominally open, but in fact the chances of any high career are not accessible to the men who present themselves to the recruiting officers of the standing Army. In the volunteers no career is closed to them. The way to the top is open in the field and in civil life as well when their service in arms is no longer required.

Now, my colleague, in the utmost good faith and sincerity, has brought in this bill, believing it to be a wise measure. I am sorry that I can not fully agree with him. I believe with him that the Regular Army ought to be reorganized and changed to the three-battalion system and adapted to the changed circumstances, to the new tactics, and improved arms. But that is as far as I can go with him. If he will modify the bill to that extent, I will be pleased to join him in its support. I believe that the increase of the Regular Army to 104,000 men, with each regiment increased to 3,000 men, would do away with the use of the National Guard or the volunteers, and this would be a fatal mistake upon the threshold of that contest that we are all now led to expect. These are the objections I have to this bill. Let us rely again, as in the past, upon the patriotism and valor of the volunteer citizen soldier of the Republic. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to occupy more time?

Mr. MARSH. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, as an officer of the National Guard of Pennsylvania, and at the request of the officers of that division, because I think this bill is striking at the volunteer soldiers of the United States, I desire to protest against its passage. I desire to confine myself, because the bill has been gone over in a general way, to the value of the volunteer as compared with the Regular Army soldier.

I want to confine myself to the force and effect it would have upon those who desire to volunteer should there be a call of war upon the members of the National Guard, and those who desire to volunteer in the armies of the United States. In the second section of this bill, sir, it is provided that there shall be created in the Regular Army a formation that is known as the three-battalion formation in each regiment, and that this formation, in case of a declaration of war by Congress, shall be made up by each regiment being divided into two battalions of four companies each, and the third battalion to include two skeleton companies and two additional companies, to be created, and the officers shall be appointed by promotions and appointments under existing law—by the President of the United States appointing, under existing laws, officers for the two additional companies. What does under existing laws mean? And I call the attention of this House, and every member who has a National Guard in his native State, that that means that the President shall appoint first by promotion from the regular service, next by meritorious examination from the corporals and sergeants in the Regular Army, and then from civil life.

I want to direct the attention of the members of this House to the fact that under this law there will not be a single member of the National Guard or a citizen in civil life in their States who could get a commission in the regular service, upon declaration of war being made by Congress, if this bill is passed. Not one. They will be shut out. Not a soldier in the National Guard of Pennsylvania, in which we have 8,000 uniformed, armed, and drilled militia—not one man of these, either officer or private, all of whom have given one night in every week for years to drill and two weeks each summer to camp work, will be eligible. For what purpose have these troops been uniformed, armed and drilled? Why does Pennsylvania spend $300,000 per annum on her National Guard? Why this perfect organization of 8,000 men, each man in which is a qualified marksman? It was in the hope that at some time, when the Government of the United States was threatened, she would come down and call upon them to take up arms in behalf of our common country.

Then they hoped that they would have an opportunity to enlist, to volunteer, not as individuals, but as companies, regiments, and brigades, taking with them their officers and maintaining the glory and pride of their local organizations. Why, sir, after this organization of the skeleton companies and battalions is officered by appointment, as provided in this bill, let us see how it is to be filled up with men. Are these regiments to be filled by volunteering by companies or regiments from Pennsylvania, from Ohio, or from Iowa? This bill positively prohibits this. Sir, they are to be filled up by the National Guard of my State and yours taking off their uniforms, throwing down their rifles, resigning from their companies and regiments, and going to some city to a United States recruiting station and enlisting in the Regular Army as recruits, to be assigned to any arm of the service—infantry, artillery, or cavalry—that may need men. Their identity is lost and their pride of command and familiar officers gone.

Under this bill the pride of local organization is destroyed. There can be no more volunteer Pennsylvania companies, regiments, and brigades to vie for honor and patriotic commendation with similar organizations from other States in the defense of our Union. Under this law the next war must be fought by the Regular Army—the volunteer soldier will be no more.

Is that a system we want to adopt in this country? Do we want to say to the young men that are in the National Guard of the various States who have risen from the ranks, who are serving there for the love of country and from patriotic motives, "You can not enlist in the service of your country unless you throw away your identity with your regiment and go in as an individual, under strange officers, into a strange organization, to serve wherever you may be assigned?" If the policy proposed by this bill be adopted, the Regular Army will be increased to 104,000 men, and not until that army is exhausted can there be a single volunteer admitted into the service of the United States, neither officer nor man, neither citizen nor National Guardsman. That is not all of it.

A comparison of the present and proposed enlisted strength of organization is supplied by the following table:

	Present.	Proposed.
	Men.	Men.
120 troops of cavalry, each	60	100
14 light batteries of artillery, each	75	173
70 heavy batteries of artillery, each	65	200
200 companies of infantry, each	65	250

The entire increase proposed is 78,954 men, of which 75,125 are to go to the infantry. The infantry increase greatly affects the National Guard, because the latter is nearly all infantry. If there is any one branch of the Army that does not need increasing in time of war, it is the United States infantry, on account of the great amount of infantry available from the National Guard and the excellent material of which this is composed. The present enlisted strength of the United States infantry is 13,125, and it is proposed to increase this by 75,125, or at a ratio of 1 experienced soldier to 5 raw recruits.

But, remembering that the present term of enlistment is three years, it follows that about one-third of the present 13,125 infantrymen, or 4,375, have less than one year's service. There remain but 8,750 experienced soldiers, making the above ratio incorrect and worse, so that it will be about 1 experienced soldier to 8 raw recruits. The leavening qualities of a United States infantry soldier must be beyond belief if each one can offset the effects of eight raw recruits. Furthermore, the new men can not be of as good a class, when enlisted hurriedly after war is declared, in regard to patriotism, morals, intellect, and education, as the National Guard that is already organized and the men well known by their officers.

The United States infantry, which already has little experience in field duty and long marches, will be composed of a heterogeneous mass of mixed nationalities, and will be little better than a levée en masse. Yet, on account of its having the name "regular," an unwarranted reliance will be placed upon it; whereas, in fact, it will be below the National Guard and volunteers. Yet, by this bill the United States infantry will almost, if not entirely, supplant the National Guard—that now valuable auxiliary to our national strength.

The after effects of such a bill can be easily foreshadowed. The probabilities of the National Guard being called into service, after this bill becomes law, will be exceedingly remote, and will cause interest in the Guard to lag. This Guard will lose its importance in the eyes of the people, and, rightly or wrongly, will fall into oblivion and disappear as an efficient and inexpensive mainstay. During the last few years, however, when they have been in the public eye, and have been regarded as a force that would be called out immediately upon a declaration of war, they have felt their responsibility and have steadily improved. The passage of this bill will mark the highest point in efficiency and numbers of what promised to be the grandest and safest body of armed men on which any nation could rely. It is composed of the safest class of men, the ideal defenders of a republic, viz, citizen soldiers.

One-fifth of the proposed increase could be assimilated by the United States infantry without material danger, but the entire increase could be managed successfully only in time of peace, when there is time to instruct and train and teach the trade of the soldier. To crowd into the infantry service eight raw recruits to every single experienced soldier leaves no part of the United States infantry service on which to rely for special strength, and there will be no fine body, no corps d'élite, for the general officer to send forward at a critical moment. Chaos and uncertainty would be the leading features of every battlefield. The word "regular" would lose its significance.

The United States infantry has now an experimental system of drill (tactics) untried in war and by many condemned. Add to this large and unwieldy companies composed of the rawest possible material after war breaks out, and an enemy could ask no greater advantage.

The bill proposes to add one second lieutenant to each troop of cavalry, one first and one second lieutenant to each battery of artillery, one second lieutenant to each company of infantry, one major (immediately, in peace time) to each regiment of infantry, and to increase each regiment of infantry by two companies. The officers created will be:

	Under bill.	Now in service.
Cavalry second lieutenants	120	120
Artillery first lieutenants	84	98
Artillery second lieutenants	84	84
Infantry second lieutenants	350	250
Infantry first lieutenants	50	.....
Infantry captains	50	.....
Infantry majors	25	.....
Total	763	.....

After war is over the Army is to be reduced again to its present strength by transfer and absorption of the supernumerary officers and transfer and discharge of enlisted men. It is easy to see that this bill, which creates 475 infantry officers and provides no way for reducing this number except through death and retirement and transferring them to the other branches, that will also be clogged with officers, has been proposed by friends of the infantry. After the close of a war the Military Academy could be profitably closed for the next twelve years, because there would have to be 738 casualties and promotions before a single vacancy for a cadet would be made.

The expense attending the maintaining of 738 supernumerary officers after a war ends would make an enormous sum.

Volunteer officers and soldiers can readily be honorably mustered out after a war ends.

Stagnation in promotion is now the curse of the Army, but after a war it would be worse than now, under the provisions of this bill.

The National Guard are already organized and ready for war and would be much more effective than the same amount of raw material hurriedly selected and crowded into the Army.

The time to train men is before war. The National Guard are the next best trained men after the Regular Army, so why not take them instead of this vast number of absolutely raw and undisciplined men? These are of no value after a war is in progress. They require disciplining, drilling, and to be trained especially at target practice. This latter takes much time. A soldier that does not know how to aim is valueless. The National Guards have had this latter practice, and have had drill and camping experience. They are already uniformed, and are practically ready for immediate service. This bill will be a snub at them, and should not pass.

Sir, the success of American arms in every war has been due to the volunteer citizen soldier. The roster of the Regular Army is to-day made lustrous by their names. Of the volunteer soldiers who entered the army during the late war, Generals Miles—now major-general—Brooke, Otis, Coppinger, Shafter, all at this time brigadier-generals, Corbin, present Adjutant-General, Ludington, Quartermaster-General, and many others rose from the ranks.

This bill is against the history and traditions of our country. It is the first step toward a large standing army in time of peace. It means to belittle the military organizations of the States and to aggrandize that of the nation. It will add greatly over a million dollars annually to the cost of maintaining our Army.

But, most of all, it closes forever the Army of the United States against the volunteer soldier, that great body of patriotic citizens that have answered every call to duty in the past and must be this nation's sure defenders in the future. I wish to call attention to the estimate placed by the great hero of American arms, General Grant, on the American volunteer soldier as compared with the "Regulars." In his Personal Memoirs, volume 1, page 283, he says:

> While at Cairo I had frequent opportunities of meeting the rebel officers of the Columbus garrison. * * * There were several officers among them whom I had known before, both at West Point and in Mexico. Seeing these officers who had been educated for the profession of arms, both at school and in actual war, which is a far more efficient training, impressed me with the great advantage the South possessed over the North at the beginning of the rebellion. They had from thirty to forty per cent of the educated soldiers of the nation. They had no standing army and, consequently, these trained soldiers had to find employment with the troops from their own States. In this way what there was of military education and training was distributed throughout their whole army. The whole loaf was leavened.
> The North had a greater number of educated and trained soldiers, but the bulk of them were still in the army, and were retained, generally, with their old commands and rank until the war had lasted many months.
> In the Army of the Potomac there was what was known as the "regular brigade," in which, from the commanding officer down to the youngest second lieutenant, every one was educated to his profession. So, too, with many of the batteries; all the officers, generally four in number to each, were men educated for their profession. Some of these went into battle at the beginning under division commanders who were entirely without military training. This state of affairs gave me an idea, which I expressed while at Cairo, that the Government ought to disband the Regular Army, with the exception of the staff corps, and notify the disbanded officers that they would receive no compensation while the war lasted except as volunteers. The register should be kept up, but the names of all officers who were not in the volunteer service at the close should be stricken from it.

Now, I appeal to those who reverence the memory of the volunteer soldiers of the country, who have made its armies illustrious in every conflict of American arms—I appeal to the members of this House for the National Guard boys, who are patriotic and enthusiastic to serve their country, to vote against this measure. [Applause.]

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. COLSON].

Mr. COLSON. Mr. Speaker, I have supported every proposition for an increase in our Navy made since I became a member of this House, for the reason that in any war between the United States and any foreign power a strong navy would be absolutely necessary to the former, and would, in fact, very probably, be required to do most of the fighting; and for the further reason that the having a strong navy by this Government ready for action at all times would have a tendency to maintain peace, especially in the Western Hemisphere, cause our flag to be respected, and guarantee the safety of American citizens wherever they may be throughout the world. [Applause.]

I would like to see Uncle Sam possess a navy that would be the pride of our country and the envy of the rest of the world, and to which no other navy of the world could give successful battle. A navy requires years to build, and must be built before the beginning of any conflict in which it is expected to take part. It takes battle ships, monitors, cruisers, torpedo boats, torpedo-boat destroyers, and other forms of craft to make a strong navy, and these can not be called into being in a day, no matter how much money may be available for the purpose.

Now, as to the Army, it is different. I am opposed to this Government maintaining a large standing army. There is no necessity for it. The bill under consideration provides for the organization of the Regular Army on a peace and also on a war footing, when its organization on a peace footing is all that is necessary. If we should provide for the expansion of the Regular Army to meet the wishes of those most clamorous for such increase, it would not, as so expanded, be sufficient for war purposes. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] admits this. On the contrary, we would, in case of war, have to rely upon the great body of the citizens of the Republic to do the fighting, and we can rely upon them, too. This being true, precludes the necessity for a large standing army.

While this bill provides for the reduction of the Army to a peace basis at the end of any war in which it may have been expanded, we all know that this provision would not be observed. The people of this country are opposed to a large standing army. They know that standing armies may become corrupt, may become partisans of would-be despots, that the safety of the country's honor and the country's flag in great crises can best be trusted to the great body of her sturdy citizens engaged in the callings of peace.

It is estimated that there are 9,000,000 men in this country that could bear arms. A majority of them would be very willing to do so should war occur between the United States and any other country. I know the men of the district that I have the honor to represent on this floor are anxious, should there be war between the United States and Spain, to fight to uphold the flag of the country and to maintain its honor. Every day I am receiving letters from my district offering companies of men for a regiment I propose to organize to take part in any war between this country and Spain.

The writers of these letters mean just what they state. They are very earnest about it. They also have asked me why the Government of the United States has not taken action. Why it has not recognized the independence of Cuba and intervened by force of arms to maintain that independence. They have asked me why Congress has not done something to help free Cuba and end the inhuman warfare which has for more than three years been waged in that unhappy island. They have asked why their Representative has not brought before this House a resolution recognizing the independence of the Island of Cuba and providing for armed intervention by the United States to maintain that independence. They also say something about the Maine, which was destroyed in the harbor of Havana, and why the murder of more than 260 American seamen by the treachery of the Spaniards is not being avenged. [Applause.]

Now, it is well understood that I have been for free Cuba from the time the war began in Cuba, in February, 1895. My constituents, I say, know this. They do not, however, understand the rules of this House, which, it is said, were framed to prevent a minority from obstructing business, to prevent a minority from standing in the way of a prompt expression by the majority of its will on any subject, but which, in fact, have made it possible for a still less minority to prevent even the consideration of any matter which the committee to which, under these rules, it must be referred and the Speaker of the House do not favor. Resolutions without number, almost, recognizing the belligerency of the Cuban insurgents, recognizing the independence of the Cuban Republic, and providing for intervention to stop the war in Cuba have from time to time been introduced in this House. Under the rules they went to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, where they were put to sleep and, it seems, to never wake again.

There has not been a day since this Congress convened that this House would not have passed a resolution of the character named had it been brought before the House by the committee referred to. With the Committee on Foreign Affairs failing to report and the Speaker of this House opposed to and refusing to recognize any member to make a motion to have the committee report such a resolution, there has been no way under the rules in which such a resolution could be gotten before the House, even though the other 340 members of this House had with unanimity desired it. I understand, however, the Speaker of this House has right recently become an insurgent, and I hope it is true. [Laughter.]

Now, a member of Congress I think probably should be forgiven for voting once for the adoption of such rules; but he should not be forgiven if he ever votes that way a second time. [Applause.] New members of Congress come here freshly elected—not familiar with the rules of the House——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. COLSON. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] to give me five or ten minutes more.

Mr. MARSH. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. COLSON. Mr. Speaker, when new members of Congress come here the fact is that they are nearly all hero worshipers. They have heard of "BOUTELLE of Maine;" they have heard of "Uncle JOE CANNON;" they have heard of "DALZELL;" they have heard of a few other old and prominent members of the House who make a great deal of noise here; and they come here ready to vote for anything that those old members of the House may propose; and not realizing what they are doing, they bind themselves hand and foot—they eliminate their own individuality. Soon they find what they have done, and then they go out into the cloakroom and kick themselves. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will please come to order. Gentlemen will be seated and cease conversation. All gentlemen will be seated.

Mr. COLSON. At the beginning of the extra session——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will suspend until the House is in order.

Mr. COLSON (after a pause). At the beginning of the extra session of this Congress——

The SPEAKER pro tempore rapped loudly for order.

Mr. COLSON. I do not want the Speaker to hammer away all my time. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will suspend until the House is in order. This will not be taken out of his time.

Mr. COLSON. At the beginning of the extraordinary session of Congress the question as to the adoption of the rules of the House in the Fifty-fourth Congress for the government of this House was presented, and on a rising vote there was, according to my recollection, a tie—148 to 148. Promptly the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] called for the yeas and nays, whereupon many Republicans who had stood up in opposition to those rules faced about and voted for their adoption. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

They did that, however, with the assurance that those rules were to be adopted only temporarily; that it would not be long before the Committee on Rules would report a set of rules for the government of this House. They have since found that they were buncoed. [Laughter.] The Committee on Rules has failed to report. It has been a few weeks since the question was raised here as to when that committee would report. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], a prominent member of it, said that he had been ill, and that the committee had had no time to consider the question.

I have observed that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], that member of the Committee on Rules, has been here ever since that time, and yet we have had no report from the committee, and we are to-day operating under those rules which this House was induced to adopt upon the assurance that they would prevail only temporarily and that the committee would soon report for the consideration of the House a set of rules for its government. And by these rules, adopted in that manner, this House has been kept from passing a resolution recognizing the belligerency or the independence of the Cuban Republic. How long will we submit to this? How long will this House allow itself to be "bottled up" by a single committee of this House? I for one am opposed to it. I am glad I voted against the adoption of the present rules.

And now, Mr. Speaker, getting back to the bill [laughter]—I hope the House will pardon this digression—I am opposed to the bill because there is no necessity for an increase of the Regular Army. In case of war the volunteer forces of the United States will defend the flag. The great body of the national militia is ample for that duty. In fact, we should leave it to them and give them the privilege of taking the lead in any struggle that may come between the Government of the United States and the Government of Spain, or any other government on the face of the earth, to the extent that land forces can be utilized.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. COLSON. I thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] for his courtesy.

Mr. MARSH. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Thirteen minutes.

Mr. MARSH. I will reserve that time, but yield a moment to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] that he may make a request.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be recognized in my own right——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can not be recognized at present.

Mr. DOCKERY. I was about to ask unanimous consent to take the floor in order that I might yield to my colleague [Mr. DE ARMOND] a part of my time.

Mr. MARSH. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I am astonished that in the discussion of a bill of this importance matters have been brought in that have no relevancy whatever to the bill. The great trouble with gentlemen who oppose the bill seems to lie in the assumption on their part that the bill interferes with the militia organizations of the States and with the volunteer forces when called into actual service. Let me say at the outstart that if I believed there were substantial grounds for any such apprehension, I would not support a paragraph of the bill. The idea grows out of a misapprehension, as I think, of what the bill is intended to accomplish.

Taking another proposition, let me say that if I thought this bill would have the effect of increasing the Army of the United States in time of peace, I would not support it. I made my record on that question almost solitary and alone when I voted against the bill providing two additional regiments as a permanent increase in the Army.

What is the pith of this bill? Let us distinctly understand it. No man has a higher respect for the volunteer service of this country than myself. No man has a higher respect for the officers of the volunteer service than myself.

But, Mr. Speaker, what are you confronted with and what have you to meet plainly and squarely? Without regard to speeches that do not touch the bill at all, what is the proposition involved here? You have an army, recognized under the laws at the present time within the limits now fixed, amounting to about 27,000 men since you passed the two-additional-regiment bill. They are skeleton organizations, in one sense of the word—that is, they are the nucleus to form an effective army in time of war. On the peace footing, however, the Army is about 27,000 men. If it is not fit for that purpose—that is, to be the nucleus of a larger army—then it is not fit for anything. You have your educated officers, whose education was paid for by the Government of the United States, and you have your military schools throughout the country for the very purpose of teaching men the art of war.

Now you have that skeleton organization, as I have said, and the only propositions important, I think—and I will call the attention as I proceed to every one that is of any importance in the matter—the only propositions of any importance lie in the fact that the President of the United States, in time of war, or upon a declaration of war, shall be permitted to proceed and do so and so. Now let me call your attention to the importance of that language.

When the original bill was presented and considered in the committee, this question was one admitting of very grave doubts. It looked like it was conferring upon the President of the United States a power which belongs to Congress—to declare war. The bill was therefore amended, and not a man can be enlisted into the United States Army—and I speak now of the Regular Army—over and above the 27,000 now authorized by law, until Congress shall declare that war is flagrant in the land. The difference in the terms consists in this: That if it shall be the will of Congress to declare war, then the President is invested with certain powers; but if somebody else declares war against us—some foreign nation—then the recommendation must come from Congress before a single man can be enlisted, under this bill, into the Regular Army.

Now, then, let us, for the purpose of illustration, examine the provisions of the bill and see exactly what it proposes.

Mr. OTEY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. COX. I think perhaps I will answer the point that the gentleman may desire to make as I proceed. For the present I prefer not to be interrupted.

Suppose we take a practical illustration of the operations of the bill. Let us put it at the worst and see what it does. Let us see how it will work. Why, the Congress of the United States declares war to-morrow—I am not talking now of what it is going to do, but I am simply illustrating a point; I am not entering into the Cuban business just at the present time, but the Congress of the United States declares war against any power on the face of the earth whatever. Then what power is conferred on the President of the United States in this bill? Simply that he shall call for the enlistment in the Regular Army of such number of troops as in his judgment may be necessary.

Now, do not mix that with the idea of the volunteer service. He calls for enlistments in the Regular Army. How? By giving notice to each of the governors of the various States that the State notified will be required to furnish so many men to serve in the Regular Army.

Mr. OTEY. Will the gentleman now permit me?

Mr. COX. I would prefer not to be interrupted now. I will, after a while, be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Now, suppose in the exercise of that function the President of the United States addresses a note to the governor of my State, for instance, and tells him that the State of Tennessee is requested to furnish 1,000 men. For what purpose? Why, simply to volunteer in the Regular Army of the United States. The officers are fixed; they are the officers of this Government; they are educated to the requirements of officers in time of war; and the governor of my State calls for 1,000 men, not to be enlisted in the volunteer service at all, but to serve in the Regular Army of the United States. Under the organization of the Regular Army and this call, suppose not a man in my State responds to that call; what is the result? An opportunity is offered to each State to furnish the recruits according to the population of the States.

Now, let me call your attention to this——

Mr. MAGUIRE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COX. Well, I will yield to the gentleman. I will probably meet the point the gentleman might have in view as I proceed, but I will answer the question now.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Will the same class of men, in the judgment of the gentleman from Tennessee, enlist in the United States Army under the conditions fixed by this bill that would freely enlist in the volunteer forces tendered by the States upon the call of the country?

Mr. COX. I am glad the gentleman called attention to that——

Mr. OTEY. Will the gentleman let me——

Mr. COX. Well, now, I will give you an opportunity in a short time.

Mr. OTEY. If the gentleman declines to yield, of course I will not interrupt him.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will permit me, I will yield to him later on. If he does not desire that, it makes no difference.

I was going to say in response to the gentleman from California that in my judgment no legislator has any right to sit here and decide that any section of the United States produces a better man than any other section, or to decide in favor of one against another. The only thing that the people doubt is that there will be no opportunity given to them to enlist. It is not that there will not be sufficient enlistments. There is no fear of that.

Now, in that very connection, and bearing upon this subject, an amendment will be proposed to the bill by the gentleman from Illinois which I shall support earnestly, and that is what is suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, not to make the companies of 250 men, but to keep them in the original line of 98 men.

Now I will yield with pleasure to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. OTEY. This bill says that upon a declaration of war by Congress, or a declaration of Congress that war exists—and you quoted that language—now, in that connection, will you tell me how any of the National Guard can be called from a State into the Army in time of war? They have got to come in companies and to be enlisted into the United States Army in the regular way, as provided by the bill.

Mr. COX. That is the trouble that I have been trying to explain, and I hope I will make it satisfactory to my friend. Let us take a view of it as it exists to-day. Every day the enrolling in the Regular Army is going on, but when you get to the limit of 27,000 men you can not go any further. Now, this bill, when properly amended, will authorize an enlistment into the Regular Army of about 42,000 men. When you get your Regular Army up to 42,000 men, suppose you do not need any more. They are under trained officers, educated officers, men we have educated for the purpose.

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COX. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. TALBERT. Suppose under this plan you do not raise the required number of Regular Army soldiers, then what?

Mr. COX. Then you call upon the volunteer service of the United States.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. And the militia.

Mr. COX. And on the militia, just as the law is now, and there is where the misapprehension has arisen.

Mr. TALBERT. But suppose the militia have been disbanded by volunteering?

Mr. COX. Nobody goes into the Regular Army except by his own free volition. It is a voluntary act of the individual, not an official act at all.

Mr. TALBERT. But, as I understand, the number must reach 100,000 first?

Mr. COX. When we get the opportunity to amend this bill, we will put it at about 42,000.

Mr. OTEY. That is a supposition.

Mr. COX. That means if you and all the rest of you vote for it.

Mr. OTEY. Yes; I will vote for it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Let me ask the gentleman whether, if there are 500,000 men needed, we may not need to have fifty or sixty thousand in the Regular Army to meet the first attack?

Mr. COX. Gentlemen, I do not desire to do anything that I do not think to be right. I will never vote to hurt the volunteer service. Nobody need be concerned about that. I have seen that, and I think I understand it; but here is the plain proposition to call out, under the amended bill, say 42,000 enlisted men in the Regular Army, with trained officers whom you have educated at an expense of millions of dollars. Part of these companies will be drilled and part of their forces ready for war. No man can say that they would not be more efficient in the service than an organization none of whom had seen war service or proper discipline or read the history or known the tactics of war.

Now, what do you object to in that? Not a militiaman of a State has to go. Not a man in a State has to go unless it is his own voluntary act. The only way it can possibly affect the militia of the State lies in the fact that if the number of enlisted men in the Regular Army is, in the judgment of the war power, sufficient to meet what is required, there will be no call; but the moment that the call goes beyond that, then the volunteer service is called, just as it always has been and as I hope it always will be.

Now, that is this bill. What is the objection to it? Let us not run off at some tangent upon it. I repeat here that if the education of your young Army officers does not confer upon them any sort of advantage in war, we ought to abolish the system and abolish it at once.

Mr. TALBERT. Then all you want in this thing is to have a few volunteer privates.

Mr. COX. That is all. Not a man has to go who does not want to go. Why not let him go if he wants to go?

Mr. TALBERT. I have no objection.

Mr. COX. Well, I have none, and that is all there is to this bill. A misconception of it has gone all through this House.

Mr. TALBERT. I do not believe they will enlist under those circumstances. Now, suppose they do not. Then what are you going to do?

Mr. COX. When you call for volunteers, probably you will get them.

Mr. TALBERT. But you can not call for volunteers until you get a hundred thousand men in the Army.

Mr. COX. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. KING. What is the advantage of this bill?

Mr. COX. Nothing in the world, except to afford to the President, the Commander in Chief of the Army, when war is declared by Congress, the opportunity to receive certain recruits into the Army, over and above the 27,000 now allowed, running the Army up to about 42,000.

Mr. TODD. Why not let Congress call for volunteers——

Mr. COX. Oh, well——

Mr. OTEY. Will you just let me ask you how a regiment from Tennessee or Virginia can go to the front in this fight at all until 42,000 regulars have been enlisted?

Mr. COX. Well, I will tell you. Suppose 42,000 do not enlist. Well, then, you call for your volunteers, and your volunteers are officered by the State, not the General Government. Then you can not take a regiment from Virginia and muster it into the service in any other way except as volunteers.

Mr. OTEY. Then they will not call for volunteers until the 42,000 are enlisted.

Mr. COX. I do not think that would follow at all.

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, hurrying over this matter, I have tried to make myself as plain as I could upon my views. Now, I want to call attention to another point that does not seem to have been observed. That is, the President might confine his call to a few States. You will find that there is an amendment which provides that he shall call on the governors of the States to furnish these men if they are willing to go.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I call for order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Utah makes the point that the House is in disorder. The House will be in order.

Mr. KING. The disorder seems to be in the galleries.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The attention of the Chair is called to disorder in the galleries. All in the galleries will please be seated and refrain from conversation. The Chair trusts that the House will set a good example to the galleries.

Mr. COX. I was trying to impress on the House this point, so that members could see that there was nothing wrong in this arrangement: Under this bill the governor of the State is to be notified that so many recruits are desired (not demanded) to fill up the skeleton companies and regiments in the Regular Army. Suppose he declines to furnish a single man. Why, that does not interfere with the volunteer service at all. It does not touch them. But suppose he responds, and a thousand men are mustered into the Regular Army. Keep in mind always it is their voluntary act; no compulsion about it at all; and they are mustered into the Regular Army. Now, when they are mustered in, they are accredited to that State on its pro rata upon a call for volunteers and that——

Mr. MAGUIRE. Do the men that come from each individual State bear any identity as soldiers of that State in the service?

Mr. COX. They are called from the State, my friend, and requested to enlist; and when they do enlist, it is a voluntary act of theirs.

Mr. MAGUIRE. But their identity is lost as representatives of States?

Mr. COX. Precisely. When they go into a regular regiment of the Regular Army, they are like any other enlisted men. I will be frank and candid with you, because if you want to preserve the identity of the volunteers from a State, you must muster them in under a State organization.

Now, one question I desire to call the attention of the House to. I want to ask this House, with perfect candor and frankness, if your Army of 27,000 men is incompetent and insufficient to repel attack, what are you going to do with it? What? Call for volunteers? Then go and reduce your officers of the Army.

Mr. COX. And make them serve not only public, but common economy.

Mr. KING. Why do you not bring in a bill reducing the officers of the Army?

Mr. COX. Well, I have trouble here with my friends. When a bill was brought in increasing the Army, you every one voted against me [laughter], my friend before me and other gentlemen excepted. But my friend from Missouri and the whole host around me, when they proposed to enlist two regiments of the artillery, voted against me; and now he comes back at me. [Laughter.] Let me call your attention to what sort of legislation that is. Call out your volunteers, the best troops that ever a nation had. There never will be in this country an army equal to the volunteers. There never will be again an army that will fight like the volunteers. They are the very best in this Government, and in times of war my hope of salvation and success lies in the volunteers. [Loud applause.] Is your Army a failure? Has it been created and has its education been foolish? Have you spent this money for training men and can not trust them with an increase of their service limited by law? If so, abolish it.

Mr. LOVE. If I understand, then, you are in favor of the amendment, but you are not supporting the bill as reported by your committee.

Mr. COX. I will state very distinctly, I fought this bill as it came into the committee in the shape it came there. Look at the amendments put into it. I did my best to put these amendments in, and I am glad to say—I always take pleasure in saying—that with the chairman of that committee and the members of the committee I had no trouble. The only trouble was in an honest discussion and a free expression of views. We amended it there as far as we could, and hope the House will help us to amend it further.

Mr. TALBERT. The point I wanted to make is, Is not the President estopped, if this bill passes, from calling for volunteers until you reach a certain maximum?

Mr. COX. He is not. Suppose the President to-morrow comes to the conclusion that under this bill he wants to fill up the Regular Army and does fill it up, and he comes to the conclusion that it is not large enough. What does he do? He calls for volunteer service from the States.

Mr. BAIRD. But the gentleman from Tennessee does not answer the gentleman from South Carolina. He asked, Can the President call for the volunteers until the Regular Army is full?

Mr. COX. No doubt of it in the world, unless he comes to the conclusion that the 42,000 recruits will be all he needs. Now, then——

Mr. LOUD. He would not wait a year or two until he could get 40,000 men, would he?

Mr. COX. No. I should think that a President of the United States who was going to war would want to have enough men to whip the enemy, and whip him quick.

Mr. TODD. Will my friend allow me a question?

Mr. COX. Go on.

Mr. TODD. I would like to ask my friend if he does not think our standing Army is large enough for a peace footing, and whether we should not depend upon volunteers for any necessary increase in time of war? If the President is authorized to call for such volunteers as are needed, we will acquire a large army more quickly and with more patriotic impulses than by the means provided in this bill.

Mr. COX. Then disband your Army; for then it would be no use as a nucleus.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What war are you talking about?

Mr. COX. Oh, my friend knows that I am good-natured and that I am not to be drawn off into the Cuban matter at all. If you want to fight Cuba, all right; if you do not want to fight Spain, it is all right. But if you are going to fight, fight like men and wipe them out quick.

Mr. SETTLE. Or give up the gun.

Mr. COX. Or give up the gun. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. I thought you were going to fight for Cuba and not against Cuba.

Mr. COX. Now, one more matter and I am through. The next important point in the bill lies in the point that when peace is declared you will reduce the Army and put it back to where it was in the time of peace. Now, when the civil war closed, with that enormous army of volunteers, Congress passed an act reducing the Army to its present basis. It carried out quite a number of officers until the Army reached its present basis.

But what does this do with the officers? There seems to be another trouble on the peace basis. This bill carries only an increase of two companies; that is done to bring your Army to a battalion organization. Nobody seems to object to that. Now, the war basis made an increase in your Army, in the organization outside of the enlisted men, of two companies. So what have you got on your war basis to increase the officers? You have got two companies and the captains and lieutenants. That is all you have got.

Mr. OTEY. What is the increase in officers?

Mr. COX. On a peace basis or on a war basis?

Mr. OTEY. On a war basis.

Mr. COX. You have on a war basis two independent companies, with the captains and the lieutenants, and that is all.

Mr. OTEY. About 700 officers.

Mr. COX. Oh, no. If that is so, the best way would be to put the officers in the ranks, and let the privates command the officers.

Mr. OTEY. I asked the gentleman what was the increase in the number of officers on a war footing; what was the total increase—700, I think.

Mr. COX. No; it is not. You call out two new companies, for what? To put your regiments on a battalion basis, and when you do that you have the officers of two new companies. That is all you have.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Does not the Committee on Military Affairs report that the Army at present embraces 1,610 commissioned officers——

Mr. COX. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONNOLLY. And that the increase of commissioned officers necessary to put the line of the Army on a war footing will be 738?

Mr. COX. How many would that make?

Mr. CONNOLLY. About 2,400 commissioned officers.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman believes that, he ought to vote against this bill.

Mr. CONNOLLY. The committee so report.

Mr. COX. Oh, no; if gentlemen will examine the report and ascertain its real meaning, they will find it to be this: That when we muster into service two additional companies, we have to officer them, and then when you add your twenty-five majors, you have the whole of the proposed increase of officers.

Now, before closing I want to consider one other point—how this Army is to be reduced. This bill provides that when we go to work to reduce the Army, we shall muster out the enlisted men. It does not, I confess, touch the officers; but that does not preclude Congress, if it becomes necessary, from reducing the number of officers just as it has done heretofore.

Mr. McRAE. How large an increase of the Army is possible under this bill?

Mr. COX. You mean the whole line?

Mr. McRAE. The whole thing.

Mr. COX. It will run the Army up from 27,000 men, if the bill be not amended, to about 104,000.

Mr. McRAE. Is it proposed that the whole difference between 27,000 men and 104,000 men shall be put in the two companies?

Mr. COX. Certainly not; and I am astonished that the gentleman should ask me such a question.

Mr. McRAE. I understood the gentleman to say it was proposed to recruit only two companies.

Mr. COX. I said only two new companies; but at the same time it is proposed to fill up the defective organization of the present companies, regiments, and battalions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Twenty-eight minutes.

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, it seems almost unnecessary for me to speak on a bill the provisions of which are so much better understood by men here who are more experienced in proper army regulations than myself. I have entertained an objection to this bill on the ground that it gave no chance for the great patriotic masses of the American people to show to the world how intensely they feel and how ready they are to meet an emergency at their country's call. I thought that this Regular Army would stand in the way of enlistment of volunteer forces. But if the explanation of the gentleman from Tennessee is the real explanation of this bill, the measure does not seem to involve the objections which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] urged against it.

But, my friends, there is one consolation to be found in this bill itself. Whether the army here provided for be too large or too small, whether the organization proposed be correct or incorrect, there is a provision that may give us some hope that we shall not be hurt by the bill; for it positively declares in terms that it is not to take effect until a declaration of war by this Congress. When will that happen? My friend from Tennessee [Mr. COX] very happily suggested in committee, until Congress may be forced finally to recognize a condition of war, brought on, it may be, by a declaration on the part of Spain for nonpayment by us for her explosives used in the disaster in the harbor of Havana.

Now, my friends, I do not see where the war is coming from, as matters look to-day. From the President's standpoint there seems no emergency. Is this pressed as an emergency bill? Where is the emergency? If the emergency comes, the American volunteer will be found ready to meet it; and if the emergency comes, we must look on land to the volunteer forces who come up in regiments from the body of the people.

I hope war may be avoided with honor, but I see no way to avoid it if we protect our national honor and lend a hand to struggling neighbors, who with pain, courage, and fortitude are contending for the inestimable blessing of freedom. Sirs, when the time shall come, the Volunteer Army will meet all demands on the land; and I trust we shall be ready with valorous sailors to uphold the glorious history our navies have written. And this brings me to the reflection that there was a time in the days of old when the President of the United States selected his Cabinet from statesmen. In those days any emergency, foreign or domestic, was promptly met.

There is one modern instance where a President discovered statesmen for his Cabinet, but it remained for this Administration, with the aid of MARK HANNA, to invent them. [Laughter.] And what is the consequence? A halting, if not cowardly policy, instant in its changes, enlivening anxiety, arousing suspicion, and disappointing patriotism; and with nothing else to do we stand here debating as to whether or not our Regular Army shall be composed of more or less men volunteered in this or that way.

While we have no assurance that any army will be needed, unless in case of armed intervention, it may be used to aid Spain in suppressing the liberty of Cuba. The money interest is on the side of Spain, and I tremble for Cuba when this Administration intervenes. I would hate to see Cuba suffering under such freedom and my own country further enslaved by the same agencies.

But, recurring to this bill, in regard to the final disbandment of this Army, that matter has been put beyond peradventure; the objection which has been urged to the bill on that ground is now entirely out of the question; for immediately on the declaration of peace or the cessation of hostilities the Army is to be simply disbanded as our former Army was disbanded after our late great war.

Mr. LOVE. Is there any provision in the bill as to how large a standing army shall remain after the termination of war?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The bill provides that after the war the Army shall be put on exactly the present peace footing. So that there can be no objection on that ground.

Mr. DOCKERY. I did not understand that anyone had urged objection on that ground.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The proposition was made, as I understand, that there would be difficulty in disbanding so large an Army and provide for its officers.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Army may be disbanded, but the officers would still remain.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Just as they are now.

Mr. BARTLETT. But there will be new ones appointed under this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No new ones will be necessary under this bill, according to the explanation of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is not the way the bill reads.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I mean no officers outside those now holding commissions in the Regular Army.

Mr. KING. Why not provide for mustering some of the officers out of the service?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I would be perfectly willing to muster out just as many officers at the close of the war as the House may agree to.

Mr. Speaker, I am not in favor of this bill. I recorded my dissent in the committee. I have great confidence in the educated officers of our Regular Army, but very little faith in the Army they command in time of peace. I have no doubt that every captain or lieutenant in the Army to-day would to-morrow, in case war should by any accident be declared, prefer to lead to battle a company enlisted by him in the neighborhood of his birth than any company now serving in the Regular Army.

Speaking for the free, brave people of Arizona, I do not hesitate to say this bill will not bring one recruit from that Territory. They will not hide their valor and lose their identity by enlisting as privates in some United States Regular Army regiment. But give them the chance in any war against us to enlist as an Arizona regiment under officers of their own selection, and the battle's edge will never become too perilous for that regiment to pass across it.

I do not believe in any great increase of the Regular Army, and to that extent I oppose this bill. I depend in war on the great mass of the common people, as the Government must depend on them in time of peace. Five hundred Arizona boys, well mounted, as they go at home, can drive any two regiments of Spanish soldiers out of the Island of Cuba into the sea and under the very wreck that Spain's unpunished perfidy wrought.

In war we must depend on our citizen soldiery. They are ready on the first call to arms. They are impatient of delay, and no patriot blames them. A halting, changing, uncertain policy, advised possibly by the invented statesmen to whom I have referred, has bred impatience in the heart of every true, liberty-loving American patriot. Let us calmly await the arrival of a promised message—if we can.

I yield back the balance of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Speaker, the present bill has for its object the increase of the Regular Army from 26,000 men to 104,000 men. I am opposed to any increase in the Regular Army at the present time, or at any time, under any circumstances, or for any purpose. Under the provisions of this bill the President of the United States can augment the Regular Army to over 100,000 men. Is there any necessity for the passage of this bill? What is the necessity, if it does exist? Can we assume that such necessity exists? Has the chairman of the Military Committee, or any member of the committee, pointed out the reasons calling for this act on the part of the Congress? Is there any war impending that would justify it? Now, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cox] says that the President can not take this action until there is a declaration of war by Congress. Would that make it any more necessary? Under the provisions of this bill the regiments are to be made up of three battalions, of companies numbering 250 men to a company, the regiments to contain 3,000 men.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cox] further informs us that in case of war these additional soldiers will come from the States. He says that the President will ask each of the States for a given number of volunteers for the Regular Army—that is to say, the President will ask the State of Tennessee or of Missouri, for instance, to provide one, two, or three thousand men to enlist in the Regular Army of the United States. We ask why the citizens of the several States should, under any circumstances, be required to enlist in the Regular Army? The reply of the advocates of the bill is that by joining the Regular Army the enlisted men will have trained, educated, and accomplished officers ready to lead them into the field. This brings a query.

How many of the officers of the United States Army have ever seen any actual service in the field whatever? The list of officers, as a rule, is made up of young men who have come out of West Point, nine-tenths of whom never saw or felt a battle. Fully one-half of them were born since the war between the States. They would be wholly unacquainted with the private soldiers. There would be no community of interest between the men and the officers. This bill provides for over 700 additional field officers. It seems to justify the suspicion that one of the important reasons for its passage is to make places for officers now in the Regular Army.

Again, I am opposed to the bill for the reason that I believe if there is to be a war the President of the United States should call upon the governors of the various States, asking them to furnish their quota of three, four, five, or ten thousand men to be sworn into the service of the United States Army. In this way the governor of each State can call out first the organized militia or National Guard and offer their services to the Government. The National Guard or militia of the several States make a greater number of men than are provided for in this bill. These militia organizations have been drilled through a series of years, are armed, uniformed, and already equipped to go into the service of the United States as volunteer soldiers of the Government.

I appeal to the members on this floor to bear me out in the declaration that this class of men formed into military organizations in various towns of the several States is made up of young men liberally educated and carrying in their veins the best and gamest blood of the sovereign States of the Union. The sergeants, lieutenants, captains, majors, colonels, and other officers of the several regiments are all the neighbors and friends of the men who serve in the ranks. Officers and privates of the militia organizations have grown up from childhood to stalwart manhood together. They have been associated with each other in the ordinary affairs of life. They have at home a community of sentiment and interest. They have a pride in their officers, and the officers in their men.

There is no man on this floor who has served as a soldier under the starry flag of the Union or the stars and bars of the Confederacy but what knows it to be a fact that men do not fight as a rule because of any inherent or natural bravery. But they do fight because of that spirit of individual and neighborly pride which is in every American heart. He finds more of that pride when his neighbor stands to the right of him and to the left of him, when his officers are the friends and companions of his everyday life. It is this element of pride that will beget bravery in the heart of any American.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. BENTON. Certainly.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Is it not a fact that every private who enlists in the volunteer service has an opportunity to reach to the very highest position in the Army, while those who are in the United States Army—the Regular Army—have no chance to rise above the grade of a noncommissioned officer?

Mr. BENTON. I thank the gentleman from California for the suggestion. It is true that in the Regular Army promotions for private soldiers do not reach the commissioned offices.

Mr. STEELE. That is hardly a fair statement of fact. I will tell the gentleman that the law permits promotions of privates in the Regular Army for bravery.

Mr. BENTON. But the conditions existing practically forbid the enforcement of any such provision.

Mr. STEELE. Not by this bill.

Mr. BENTON. If this bill is carefully read by members you will find that the officers of each regiment in the Regular Army are made up from officers already in the service of the Government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my idea is that if the soldiers of each company elect their own sergeants, lieutenants, captains, and other company officers, and the majors and colonels are taken from their own States—selected because of their acquaintance with and knowledge of the soldiers—that we will have the best character of organizations. Regiments made up of sterling privates, officered by their gallant neighbors, will make the very best possible fighting machines. Again, when the promotions come, the men of the companies will be permitted to have something to say as to who will be promoted from the ranks.

Mr. HULL (interrupting). Let me ask the gentleman if the law does not provide that in the Regular Army companies are officered by Regular Army officers?

Mr. BENTON. Yes, sir; that is my contention, and is one of the objections I have to this bill becoming a law.

Mr. HULL. Are not the volunteers allowed to elect their officers?

Mr. BENTON. That is correct, and I may add, in my opinion, proper.

Mr. HULL. Then there is nothing in this bill to change the provisions of the law.

Mr. BENTON. Yes; but under the provisions of the bill, as I will show, the volunteer will find no place for himself unless he is disbanded from his militia organization and joins the Regular Army. For I can see no necessity, under any circumstances that present themselves to me at this time, for more than 105,000 soldiers. What do we want with any more than that number—that is, what can be the need of the United States for a greater number?

The suggestion may come of possible war with Spain on account of the Cuban situation. Mr. Speaker, if this Government, or, rather, this Administration, shall wake up to its duty to poor, starving Cuba, if tardy justice is to be done by this Government, 100,000 soldiers is all we need. If the Government of Spain, with its whole army pouring in on devoted Cuba, has not been able in three years to beat down and destroy thirty-five or forty thousand ragged, undisciplined, unarmed, and unfed people on the Island of Cuba, how long would her legions stand before the onset of 100,000 American soldiers made up from our militia organizations?

I do not oppose this bill, Mr. Speaker, because I am unfriendly to the Cuban cause; no, no. Along with this side of the House I have stood up on every count in favor of the demand that belligerent rights or the recognition of independence be accorded to that unhappy people. I voice the sentiment of all the people whom I represent when I say that if this Government had done its plain duty as a republican government, a Christian government, belligerent rights would have been granted to Cuba more than a year ago. If the unseen power of the money changer had not been stronger than the bright fires of patriotism, 300,000 starving Cubans would not have died, 266 American seamen would not have lost their lives, and our gallant battle ship, bearing the flag of a restored Union, would now be gallantly floating on the waters instead of at the bottom of the sea in Havana Harbor, the victim of Spanish treachery.

The people of Missouri, aye, of all the States, have waited for the Administration to move. They have seen our President insulted, our flag insulted, our sailors murdered, our ship blown up, our neighbors in Cuba fighting and dying for freedom. Our people have heard the Cuban cry for succor, and have been astonished and humiliated that our Republic has turned a deaf ear to Cuba's call. Let us hope that the voice of American freemen will yet be strong enough to drown the hoarse cry of the money kings.

No, Mr. Speaker, possible war with Spain furnishes no sufficient reason for an increase in the Regular Army. Under this bill how will our volunteer militia get into the Army? Not until the Government of the United States fills up the regiments, as suggested under the provisions of this bill, to the full number of 104,000 men.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question? I will yield to him sufficient time to make up for all that I occupy.

Mr. BENTON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HULL. Under the present law, in the case of war, with the present organization of the Army, you may have 25,000 infantrymen alone. You could have 12,000 cavalrymen alone. Under the law as it now exists, in time of war the artillery would have 11,248 artillerymen.

Mr. BENTON. You mean under the present law.

Mr. HULL. Yes; making a total of 48,248 men.

Mr. BENTON. Yes.

Mr. HULL. Now, I want to suggest to the gentleman that the main point of this bill, which I should like to hear discussed, is the modern formation of the three battalions. The increase of the Army can be easily fixed. When we come to the size of the companies, it is easy then to reach the point of the size we want.

Mr. BENTON. I do not particularly care to discuss that feature of the bill. The manner of forming the regiments into three battalions is not, with the little information I have, the very objectionable feature of this bill. The objections which I urge are, first, that it makes the regiments too large. Under the new system of going into action a regiment of 3,000 men marching abreast would be 3 or 4 miles long. The field officers could not be in touch with the men. My own knowledge on the subject of the organization of the regiments is that 1,000 men are as many as ought to be in any one regiment, exclusive of the officers; that 100 men, together with their officers, is large enough for a company. I do not believe that companies or regiments ought to be so large that they can not be under the immediate supervision of their several officers. That is my view on that subject for whatever it is worth.

Mr. Speaker, my contention is, in the first place, that there is no necessity for enlisting 100,000 men in any possible war that may confront us. If that is true, there will be no call for volunteers if you fill up the regiments as is called for in this bill. And the National Guard or organized militia of the several States will not be called into service, and none of the men composing the militia organizations will get into the service unless as individuals they come and enlist in the several companies and regiments of the Regular Army of the United States. In that case they will be officered by men who are total strangers to them, who care nothing for them as individuals, and about whom they do not care anything. The idea that I want to impress upon this House is that the citizen soldier, with his own neighbor and friend as his immediate officer, selected at his suggestion, is the best for service for this country in case of battle.

If a man has to enlist under this law in the United States Army, he loses his identity. He is no longer a soldier from Texas or Illinois, from Tennessee or Indiana, from Kansas or Missouri, but he is simply a United States soldier. There is left to him no pride of village, town, or city; no pride of county or State to fire his heart or nerve his arm.

He is a mere atom. The marked difference between a Regular Army soldier and the volunteer soldier is this: The Regular Army soldier, as a rule, enlists to be fed and clothed and paid $13 a month. The volunteer soldier enlists because of the patriotism that is in his own breast, and because of the patriotic feeling of his town, his county, his State, and his reverence for our General Government. [Applause.]

As I said in the outset, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to increasing the Regular Army under any circumstances. The average American citizen does not look to the Regular Army as the best protection to our Government and its people. There has grown up a very strong sentiment in this country in opposition to the standing army. The people have seen and felt the use of the standing army in times of peace. They have seen it called upon in open, plain violation of the Constitution to do duty within the borders of the sovereign States without the call of the governor or the legislature.

They have seen the standing army pressed into service to carry out the edicts of the Federal courts, that are doing so much legislating in these latter days. They have seen the Regular Army brought into cities and towns to overawe the citizen when he protested against starvation wages for his labor. To the plain citizen the presence of Regular Army soldiers to enforce the decrees of courts does not serve to arouse his patriotism. The great majority of the plain people of this country consider the standing army as a menace to liberty. I trust the idea of the regular standing army may never become popular in the American heart. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I believe in a return to first principles. Mr. Jefferson in his first inaugural address laid down the principles of government suited to a free people. He enunciated the true doctrine when he declared that "the best reliance of a republican government was on its militia." Our Government has always relied on the militia when imperiled. The volunteer soldiers of the States, in the service of the General Government, have upheld the flag and maintained the honor of our country.

When the day of battle comes there are no questions asked as to how many Regular Army soldiers there are in the field. But there was frequently heard: Is that the Eighth Iowa to our right? Is the Fourth Tennessee on our left? Is that the Second Illinois Cavalry in front? Where is Cockrell's Missouri Brigade?

Mr. Speaker, if war comes, let the President call on the governors of the States for volunteers. The volunteer soldier will bare his breast to the storm of war and bring victory to the flag. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. Res. 178. Joint resolution granting permission for the erection of a monument or statue in Washington City, D. C., in honor of the late Albert Pike.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, requested to furnish the House of Representatives, at the earliest time practicable, such information as he may have regarding the possibility of providing deeper draft at the entrance into Charleston Harbor than is contemplated by the approved project for the improvement by jetties of the entrance to that harbor; and that he be requested further to submit a plan and estimate of the cost of securing a depth of not less than 26 feet at low water from the ocean to deep water inside the harbor, and to report his opinion as to the advisability thereof.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 3472. An act to incorporate the Masonic Temple Association of the District of Columbia; and

S. 1116. An act to pay the heirs of the late John Roach, deceased, $330,151.42, for labor and material, dockage and detention, and occupation of yards and shops for the gunboats Chicago, Boston, and Atlanta.

THE GALLERIES.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to report the resolution which was offered this morning with respect to the galleries.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] wishes to present a report from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules have had under consideration resolution No. 278, and report the following as a substitute and recommend that the same be adopted:

"Resolved, That until otherwise ordered by the Speaker there be issued daily by the Doorkeeper to each Representative and Delegate two tickets to the galleries of the House, and the Doorkeeper is hereby authorized and directed to reserve sufficient space to accommodate the holders thereof.

"During the pendency of this order the rules as to the members' family and the visitors' galleries are suspended."

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, just a word of explanation to the House. This will give two tickets to each Member and Delegate daily. They will be taken up at the door. The tickets heretofore issued by the Speaker to the family gallery and by members of the House to the visitors' gallery will be suspended. That must of necessity be. The public gallery will be reserved to the public, extending from that railing to the corner railing, and a portion of it will be assigned to ladies and to ladies with escorts and a portion to gentlemen without ladies. The rest of the galleries, excepting the executive and diplomatic galleries, will be reserved to the holders of these cards.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the doorkeeper, under this resolution, take up the tickets from the visitors when they first come in, so that afterwards they can not be used again during that day?

Mr. HENDERSON. I could not hear all of the gentleman's question, but I will say that these tickets will be taken up daily. There is no other way to make it safe.

Mr. KITCHIN. But the question is this: Supposing a visitor comes in under one of these tickets. Now, when that visitor goes out, will the doorkeeper then take up the ticket, so that it can not be again used during the remainder of that day?

Mr. HENDERSON. That ticket will take him in and out during that day, but no longer. I want to say we have brought this up at this time, interfering with the special order, because the Doorkeeper will have to have the tickets printed, and they can not be printed and deposited in your boxes to-day, but they will be printed in time, and you will find them in your post-office box to-morrow.

Mr. KITCHIN. The ticket may be used two or three times in the day by different people, but there will only be one ticket?

Mr. HENDERSON. The ticket will take in or out anyone who holds the ticket, but each ticket will be taken up each day.

Mr. TALBERT. And new tickets will be issued every day?

Mr. HENDERSON. That will have to be done.

The SPEAKER. The tickets will be taken up by the doorkeeper when the gallery is entered.

Mr. DOCKERY. As I understand the Chair, the ticket is not returned to the person.

The SPEAKER. It is not returned to the person who held it.

Mr. DOCKERY. Even though he desired to go out and return in fifteen minutes?

The SPEAKER. Perhaps some arrangement can be made for that purpose, but the tickets are to be taken when the recipient enters the gallery.

Mr. DOCKERY. It occurs to me, Mr. Speaker, if an arrangement were made by three or four parties who desire to use the same ticket during the day, the order would be entirely safe if the ticket should have the date printed on it.

The SPEAKER. The difficulty is that some tickets might be passed out after people came in.

Mr. BAILEY. Here is the difficulty I see: That if some visitor or some one holding a ticket went into the gallery and should be called out for any purpose—for lunch, or for any other reason—if the ticket were taken up and not returned, he would be unable to reenter the gallery, and yet under this system there will be a seat for each one of these tickets.

The SPEAKER. That can be arranged by the doorkeeper.

Mr. BAILEY. The doorkeeper could hand the ticket to them as they passed out again.

The SPEAKER. That can be arranged. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. EVANS. I desire to have the resolution read before action is taken.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the resolution.

The resolution was again reported.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

ARMY BILL.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I simply ask leave to print the substitute which I want to discuss to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to have printed the substitute which he proposes to offer. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The proposed substitute is as follows:

A bill for the better organization of the line of the Army of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That hereafter the organization of each regiment of infantry now in service shall embrace 1 colonel, 1 lieutenant-colonel, 2 majors, 10 captains, 12 first lieutenants, 10 second lieutenants, 1 sergeant-major, 1 quartermaster-sergeant, 1 chief musician, 2 principal musicians, 2 battalions of 4 companies each, and 2 skeleton or unmanned companies; the organized companies to be constituted as now authorized by law: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as abolishing the office of chaplain in each regiment of colored troops: And provided further, That the vacancies in the grade of major created by this section shall be filled by promotion, according to seniority in the infantry arm.

SEC. 2. That hereafter the pay of officers and enlisted men of artillery, while serving with either light batteries or heavy artillery, shall receive the same pay as is now provided by law for cavalry; and artillery while serving as infantry shall receive the same pay as is now provided for infantry.

SEC. 3. That upon a declaration of war by Congress, or a declaration of Congress that war exists, the enlisted strength of a battery of artillery and company of engineers, respectively, may, in the discretion of the President, be increased to comprise not exceeding:

For each battery of heavy artillery: One first sergeant, 1 commissary-sergeant, 23 sergeants, 10 corporals, 2 musicians, 2 artificers, 1 wagoner, 161 privates; total enlisted, 200.

For each battery of field artillery: One first sergeant, 1 quartermaster-sergeant, 1 veterinary sergeant, 6 sergeants, 15 corporals, 2 farriers, 2 artificers, 1 saddler, 2 musicians, 1 wagoner, 141 privates; total enlisted, 173.

For each company of engineers: One first sergeant, 10 sergeants, 10 corporals, 2 musicians, 64 first-class privates, 63 second-class privates; total enlisted, 150.

The quartermaster, commissary, and veterinary sergeants provided for in this section shall have the pay and allowances of sergeants of their respective arms.

SEC. 4. That in time of war the President shall cause the batteries of artillery authorized by law to be organized as heavy or field artillery, as in his judgment the exigencies of the service may require.

SEC. 5. That in time of war every officer serving with troops operating against an enemy, who shall exercise, under assignment in orders issued by competent authority, a command above that pertaining to his grade, shall be entitled to receive the pay and allowances of the grade appropriate to the command so exercised: Provided, That a rate of pay exceeding that of a brigadier-general shall not be paid in any case by reason of such assignment.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield ten minutes to my colleague [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, with some diffidence, feeling that I am not well acquainted with the subject under consideration, and yet with well-settled views as to the policy which I think is involved, I venture to address the House briefly upon the pending bill. I have nothing whatever to say against the Regular Army, but, if time permitted, could say very much in its praise, because many and many a page in American history, glorious now and glorious forever, has been written by it.

Neither can I say anything against the officers of the Regular Army—the trained officers from the great Military Academy at West Point—that will rank in standing, in achievements, by the great soldiers it has developed and trained, with the best the world has ever known. Believing, however, that under our Government and according to its genius the reliance and dependence of our country at all times, in peace and in war, must be upon the great mass of our citizenship, upon the patriotism which animates them and the courage which will characterize them upon any and every field, I am convinced that the legislation proposed is in the wrong direction.

As was well said by my colleague [Mr. BENTON], we can not suppose if a war is to come between this country and Spain that a larger army than that provided for in this bill will be required. Eloquently and forcibly he called attention to the fact that for three years an immense army from Spain has proved totally unable to conquer the weak, poorly disciplined, poorly fed, poorly armed forces of Cuba. And in view of this, in view of the achievements of our soldiers upon every field, in every war in which they have been engaged, there can not be a doubt, I think, that an army of 100,000 men will be ample, and more than ample, for all the needs of the United States in any conflict, probable or possible, with Spain.

Then this bill, in fact, would provide a regular army to fight the battles of the country, if battles are to be fought, to the exclusion of volunteer soldiers. The gentleman from Iowa, speaking on this question a short time since, said, and my colleague [Mr. BENTON] urged in even stronger language, that a large share of the glory of the war, if we are to be involved in war, is to come from that generous, noble rivalry of the troops of one State with the troops of another State, all for the cause of humanity and freedom, as shall appear when the story of battles and victories is told and retold.

In an American volunteer army the individual soldier is much. In the Regular Army the private soldier is but a small part of a great machine—

The individual withers and the army is more and more.

If we are to read chronicles of bloody warfare, let us read of the charges of regiments of volunteers from New York, from Ohio, from Missouri, from Texas, and from the several other States of the Union. Let the soldiers from one proud State, the volunteer citizen soldiery answering their country's call, meet in generous rivalry, under the one flag and for the one cause, the volunteer citizen soldiery from the other proud States. That will be a fitting representation of the American people upon the field of battle, where is to be settled great issues worthy of the nation, worthy of its traditions, worthy of its responsibilities, its hopes.

Why should the entire fighting force of the United States be mustered into the Regular Army? Have we not about enough soldiers in the Regular Army? Will those who enlist among the "regulars" be better soldiers than those ready to go forward as volunteers under the State flag, floating just below the Stars and Stripes? Why ought not the comradeship, the fellowship, of those who go out of the same community be sustained and carried through the trying scenes of war?

If playfellows in childhood, schoolboys together, fellow-students in the years of early manhood, associates, aye, bosom friends, with full confidence and trust in one another—if they go to war under their country's starry banner, why should they not go forward side by side, trusting friends as well as soldiers? Then when the battle rages, when the supreme test is applied, each man will feel that at his side stands a friend. He will feel that if some deadly missile strikes him and he falls he will fall into the arms of a friend, and that his last words uttered upon earth, some message to his loved ones at home, will drop into the ear of a friend, to be carried, he may fondly hope, to those vainly watching and waiting for his return.

Such is the American citizen soldiery; such is the volunteer army that has made this country glorious for a century of war, peace, and progress. Why should we banish that army?

I am proud of my State, proud of the glorious record her sons have made on a hundred battlefields. I wish to see Missourians to the front. I wish to hear and to read of the gallant deeds of Missouri volunteers. I wish to hear and to read of the achievements of the heroes and the sons of heroes from old Virginia, from Texas, Tennessee, New York, Kentucky, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts.

Let each volunteer have the opportunity to gather new laurels for his State at the moment that new laurels are gathered for the United States—his nation. Then your warfare will be truly American, truly republican, truly democratic, really worthy of our great Republic.

It is no reproach to the Regular Army, it is no criticism of the superb officers trained in the art of war at West Point, to say that if our people are to go forth to battle they ought to go surrounded by their friends, officered within their regiments by friends of their choice. They ought to be permitted to give battle as American citizen soldiers.

Whatever may be said of the excellency and efficiency of the Regular Army, there are distinctions, and creditable ones, which may be observed in favor of the citizen soldiery. They are of the body of the people to-day—farmers, mechanics, merchants, clerks, professional men—to-morrow, warriors, the equal of any upon battlefield, at sieges, upon long marches, and in endurance of all the privations known to the soldier. And, the war over, how quietly these volunteer soldiers drop back into the peaceful pursuits of life. This is the kind of soldiery upon which we must depend. From this soldiery there never is danger, while from it always will come efficient service and glory and honor to the nation.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Yes; but my time is limited.

Mr. COX. I will not take much of your time. Now, any man in Missouri or Tennessee can enlist, if he pleases, in the Regular Army.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Exactly. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Tennessee suggests that under this bill a man in Missouri or Tennessee may enlist in the Regular Army. That is true. In that case he goes in as a member of the Regular Army of the United States, severing himself entirely from his State.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield the gentleman two minutes further.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Going in as a member of the Regular Army, does he go in with friends; does he go in under officers of his choice or the choice of his friends? No; where he may go, who may be his company and regimental officers, who shall stand to his right, who touch elbows with him on the left, are matters that he can not determine, matters about which he has no say. I repeat, when he thus goes in he loses his character as a Tennesseean or a Missourian; he becomes simply a private in the Regular Army of the United States.

What I ask—what I think ought to be allowed by this House—is that when the Missourian goes to war as a volunteer soldier, no less true to the Union—the great nation made up by the union of these mighty States—than a member of the Regular Army, he may go forth to battle also as a Missourian, proud of the record of his State in peace and in war. He will be no less efficient as a soldier, and, while reflecting glory upon the arms of our common country, he will also reflect glory upon his State.

Let the helpful rivalry come between these soldiers from the respective States, each in his own State organization—the friendly, noble rivalry in determining who can fight hardest, who can march farthest, who can gather—to be clustered upon and twined about the shield of our common country—the brightest flowers of glory. That is the volunteer-soldier policy as against the Regular Army policy. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DOCKERY. I now yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL].

Mr. HULL. Before the gentleman from Colorado proceeds, I hope it may be agreed that general debate may close to-day at 5 o'clock in order that we may take up the bill under the five-minute rule and have extended debate on the different paragraphs as they are reached. Considering the bill in that way, members can get a better idea of it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would very much prefer that the gentleman consent at 5 o'clock to recommit the bill.

Mr. HULL. I see no necessity for that.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think it will save time to do so. If I do not mistake the temper of the House, the bill, if brought to a vote, will be rejected by an overwhelming majority.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I have no feeling on this subject——

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not want to anticipate the defeat of the bill, but it seems to me a recommitment would be the nearest way out.

Mr. HULL. There is no use in recommitting the bill, because the House, without recommitting it, can change it so as to preserve, if it so desires, only the battalion organization. In that way time will be saved. If it can be agreed that general debate close at 5 o'clock and the bill be then considered under the five-minute rule for amendment, we can, as we go through the paragraphs, determine the size of the companies and decide also the question as to the increase or decrease of the Regular Army as absolutely as could be done by a recommitment of the bill.

Mr. COX. I had a certain number of minutes reserved, and then I yielded to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]. He did not consume all my time. I wish to know from the Speaker how many minutes I have remaining?

The SPEAKER. Twenty-one minutes.

Mr. HULL. The point I want to get at is this: I think that when we come to consider amendments to the bill, there ought to be quite full discussion; and in that way we can go on and perfect the bill in the House just as well as by recommitting it. The main point about which the committee is especially anxious is the question of the modern formation, and the increase or decrease of the Regular Army, the House can settle without recommitment.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not think there is any objection to the modern formation. The only suggestion I have heard supplemental to that is that the Regular Army be reorganized on the basis of the present force.

Mr. HULL. As provided by law in time of war. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill close at 5 o'clock.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I should like to say——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill close at 5 o'clock.

Mr. MARSH. I object.

Mr. COX. If this arrangement interferes with my using the time I have reserved, I shall make objection.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH].

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL].

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill, because I think that 25,000 men are enough for the Regular Army, either in time of war or in time of peace. I object to this bill because I think that it is wholly oblivious of all the laws of human nature.

The Regular Army, if it is increased at this time in the regular way, must necessarily call on the men from Colorado and Missouri and from other portions of the country that are not drilled, men that are unemployed and who will seek the Regular Army more for the purpose of securing a subsistence than for the purpose of accomplishing the demands which may be made upon the Army of the nation. On the other hand, if the bill is permitted to be so perfected as to call into action the National Guard of the different States, then you get an army of men well drilled and in a great many particulars as well officered as the Regular Army of the United States.

Taking the State of Colorado, for instance. I have just received a letter from our adjutant-general saying that the head of the State militia of that State graduated at the head of the class of 1884 at West Point. The National Guard, generally, of the various sections of the country is drilled in competition with the other forces from different portions of the State. There is a competition and a rivalry existing amongst them to secure the best drill and soldierly bearing, and to-day it is safe to say that many of them could make a very favorable competitive showing, as far as drill is concerned, with the United States Regular Army.

If it is the object of this committee to fill up the Army for the present prospective exigency, it is wholly impracticable under the plans proposed here; because we know, from human nature and from the history of mankind, that when you call upon men generally to come from different portions of the country to enlist in the Army of the United States, you will not get the very best fighting element of the country. You are more liable to secure that element of our population which is not self-reliant; you will more probably secure an element of the country that is not willing and is not capable of competing with their fellows in the ordinary avocations of life.

And therefore I say if you should fill up the Army from 25,000 to 104,000, as is proposed here, the greater part of that Army would be totally undrilled and not of the best fighting blood of the country; and such a body of men can not be trained and fitted for service and properly used as an emergency army. The National Guard is drilled, ready for action, and of the best citizenship of the nation.

In the last war President Lincoln and his advisers in the beginning ignored the same law of human nature to which I have referred; they first started in as though they had the idea that it was to be a war of the Republican party; that it was, in other words, to be a Republican war. You know how things languished. You know the great apathy in Democratic States. Democratic strongholds concluded that if it was to be a Republican war they would have no responsibility or part in it.

But when Ben Butler was called to Washington he said, "Mr. President, let me go into these great Democratic strongholds; let me advise them that this is a popular war in favor of the Union—a war by the people for the safety and integrity of the Constitution—and you issue commissions to Democrats and they will give full support to the Union cause; but Democrats will not make the roll of privates if the Republicans hold all the commissions." Now, you know the result. But you start in under the provisions of this bill and call men from Colorado or from Missouri or any other State to enlist in the Army, using the Regular Army as a reservoir from which to officer them, and the public sentiment will be so strong against it that you will get nothing but a few stragglers from these various States who are not capable of making a living at home. You get a class of men who would be of little service in the Army and who are of no value at home.

I have letters from Colorado miners, saying, "We want to organize a miners' regiment, a regiment that will be experienced in handling dynamite." I hear of others saying they want to organize a "cowboy" regiment, who are experts in horsemanship. We find the same thing is true among other classes and avocations in the various States. When you ignore the beacon lights that stir up an emulation for rank you ignore every principle upon which you can get up and maintain an efficient army. If we must have an army for the present exigency, we must have an army in the next few months. I received from our adjutant-general a day or so ago two letters, and to show you how jealous they are of your discrimination against any portion of the country, or of your ignoring their efficiency for active service, I desire to read these letters in full.

This is what the adjutant-general of Colorado says:

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE, Denver, March 31, 1898.

SIR: I desire to call your attention to certain features of the Army reorganization bill now pending in the House of Representatives.

Section 3 of the bill provides for increasing the enlisted force of the Regular Army to more than 100,000 men in case of war. The effect of this section will be to prevent the National Guard of the several States from being called on unless more than 100,000 men are needed. This would seem unjust for many reasons. The National Guard is organized, equipped, drilled, and disciplined, and its members have devoted a great deal of time and study in order to educate themselves so as to be of assistance to the country in time of need. The organizations of the National Guard would also be imbued with esprit du corps, which is a feature essential to success, and which would not prevail in the case of recruits suddenly added to the forces of the Regular Army.

It is suggested that the following amendment to section 3 of the bill would prevent an injustice being done the National Guard, and would also give to the country better service in a case of emergency: "Provided, That such increase shall not be made until the available strength of the organized National Guard shall have been called into service."

If you will have the kindness to investigate this matter, the action will be highly appreciated by the members of the National Guard of Colorado, and doubtless will meet the approval of the National Guard of every State and Territory in the Union.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CASSIUS M. MOSES,
Adjutant-General.

Hon. J. C. BELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

And again he writes:

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE, Denver, March 31, 1898.

SIR: It has come to the knowledge of the writer through unofficial sources that in the event of the National Guard of the various States being called on for service in a possible war with Spain only the States east of the Rocky Mountain region will be asked to furnish troops.

The writer desires to direct your attention to the fact that the National Guard of Colorado has responded to numerous calls for service in the past four years, having been on duty to suppress riots, etc., for a total of eight months during that period, and the experience gained in this service would be of inestimable value in time of war.

Our Guard consists of two regiments of infantry, a battery of light artillery, and three troops of cavalry, the members of the cavalry owning their own horses. The entire Guard of the State is fully equipped for field service.

The brigadier-general commanding the Guard is Irving Hale, who graduated from West Point at the head of the class of 1884, and is very favorably known at the War Department.

In the event of war the entire National Guard of Colorado desires to be among the first called for duty, and if you will use your influence to have this desire gratified you will place under many obligations that portion of your constituency known as the National Guard of Colorado.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CASSIUS M. MOSES,
Adjutant-General.

Hon. J. C. BELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Now, gentlemen, that spirit is in every State of the Union. We do not want any more regular soldiers. The time of war is of all times the period when we least want the raw regular soldier. The regular soldier is a safeguard in time of peace. Not saying anything in disparagement of the regular private, but, generally speaking, many of them drift into the Army of necessity. Too often men who have not been able to cope successfully with their neighbors in private affairs seek the Regular Army in times of peace for food and clothing and because they are not self-reliant enough to fight their way alone in private life.

But when you come to war, if war must be, you will find that the man who has succeeded at home among his fellows in the general avocations of life will be at the front. You will find the young men of the country generally wanting to go with their neighbors and wanting to be officered by their own citizens. You will find miners who want a miners' regiment. You will find the cowboys wanting a cowboy regiment. You will find that the city boys will want a city regiment. You will find that the farmers will want a farmers' regiment, and this combination, with the strong emulation it will engender, will form the army that must win our battles now, as they have been won in the past.

I am opposed to this bill for these reasons, and I am opposed to any increase of a standing army, because it tends too much toward militarism. Wherever a nation has organized a great standing army a military despotism has followed. Every increase of the Army is a menace to the civil power. The National Guard is segregated and responsible in times of peace to the governor of the State where formed, and is a strength to the civil power. [Applause.]

I now yield back to the gentleman from Missouri any time I may have left.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. OGDEN].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I have a certain number of minutes left.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has twenty-one minutes.

Mr. COX. I should like to be recognized.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have not used up all my time.

Mr. COX. I think the gentleman had better wait until I get through with my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] has the floor. The Chair understood that he had yielded the floor.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. OGDEN].

Mr. OGDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the bill under consideration for more than one reason. In the first place, I am opposed to the increase of the Regular Army of the United States. There is no necessity for such an increase. In my opinion, the only good feature in this bill is the proposed battalion organization. The change of the organization of the regiment from ten companies to twelve companies could, it seems to me, if that was the wish of the committee, have been brought about in another way. The committee could have brought in a bill changing the regimental organization without involving all this vast increase of enlisted men.

The very report that the committee brings in with this bill is enough to condemn it in the eyes of almost every man, whether he has ever had any experience in military affairs or not. Some of the older members of this House have had some experience in war. We all recognize that the methods of war have changed in the last thirty or forty years, since the late civil war was fought, and we recognize the necessity of changing the method of the organization of our regiments to comport with the present manner of fighting throughout the world. We know that the old double-line formation has gone forever, and we know that that has been succeeded by what is known as the "skirmish line" formation.

The various Secretaries of War have from time to time sent in reports to Congress upon this subject. I will read from the report of the committee what the Secretary of War in 1894 says, which is a fair sample of all:

The organization of the line of the Army has undergone no material change since the close of the civil war. During this period of thirty years every large foreign army has been completely reorganized. Changes and improvements in arms, ammunition, and equipments have forced upon the leading strategists and tacticians of the great armies of the world the necessity of a broad departure from the old systems.

All have adopted the battalion as the tactical unit for infantry and artillery serving as infantry, and nearly all the equivalent of the squadron as the cavalry unit. The light-artillery battalion has a similar composition. Should our Army ever be brought into collision with disciplined foreign troops our present formation would prove so defective as to turn the scale against us in a conflict on terms otherwise equal.

For some years the Secretaries of War, the generals commanding the Army, and the most eminent authorities in military science in this country have urged the adoption of the battalion formation, and our most progressive and best-informed officers believe that the organization of our small Army should embody this universally approved result of modern military thought.

Four companies are as large a body as is now possible for one officer to lead and control in action. Formerly, and down to a recent date, the colonel could see and direct the movements of all the men of his regiment, who marched and fought in double rank with touch of elbows. Under such conditions a regiment of 1,000 men occupied a front on the battle line no greater than would now be covered by a small battalion of one-third that number. A few years ago small-arms fire was ineffective at distances greater than 600 or 800 yards, while now it will be deadly at ranges of 2,000 yards, or at even greater distances.

In modern warfare the men will act in small groups or singly, and the advance will be made in successive lines in open order. Perfect organization and perfect control by the commander of each unit will be absolutely essential to efficiency and success in the field.

The National Guard of several of the States, more progressive than the General Government, already has the three-battalion organization, and our own Army is being instructed as thoroughly as our defective system will permit, battalions of from two to five companies being improvised in the different garrisons.

The committee indorses Senate Report No. 231 of the first session of the Fifty-second Congress, which says:

In the same tactical formation of infantry probably fifteen men would be killed where one was killed with the former firearm. Add to this the powerful machine guns now used, such as the Gatling and Hotchkiss, and the rate of death to the closed files of double rank would be terribly increased. This it is that makes the present single-battalion double-rank formation a suicidal one, and that has caused its abandonment in other civilized nations.

For a line to live under these changed conditions means that it shall be a single line, with intervals or spaces between the men who are to receive attack or make assault. The length of line of the present 1,000 men of a regiment, in double rank, without intervals, is about 300 yards, and in single rank 600 yards. Every regimental commander of our late war will appreciate the difficulty of commanding even this length of line. In the din of battle neither voice nor bugle note can easily be heard. The noise of conflict has been greatly intensified by the introduction of the breech-loading repeating firearm.

Von Scherff, the great German military writer, referring to the Franco-Prussian war, says: "It was very difficult for officers to keep their men together, because of the noise of a close conflict between breechloader and breechloader."

Let the single line be lengthened by intervals between the files, as it must now be, and how powerless would any colonel be to control and command his regiment? He absolutely needs the three-battalion formation with a subordinate commander, a major, for each battalion.

He can not even personally command one and supervise the action of the others, for with the battalions properly placed according to modern tactics, each in rear of the other, the first with its skirmishers and supporting lines and columns holding a front of 200 yards and a depth of 400, the second and third battalions in column, with spaces of about 250 yards intervening; with a total depth (owing to the far-penetrating power of the modern arm) of about 1,000 yards, being about the depth of a division prepared for battle as it was formed in the three-line brigade organization during our war, the colonel commanding could not only not be heard, but in most cases he could not see his command. The lieutenant-colonel, as the title implies, is needed as the lieutenant or general assistant of the colonel, and the majors commanding battalions become an absolute necessity for successful warfare.

To sum up the tactical matter, the old line-of-battle formation used during our civil war "now belongs to the past as completely as the Macedonian phalanx, and the general who would use it would simply invite the murder of his army and sacrifice the cause of his country on the altar of imbecile conservatism." The present organization is objectionable in that it has no expansive power and must be totally changed in time of war, thus violating a familiar military maxim that "the plan of an army should be the same in time of peace as in time of war."

Further on they say that the unit ought to be reduced. Now, what does this bill do? Under the present organization form a regiment consists of 10 companies. This bill increases it to 12 companies, adopting the battalion formation, and allows in time of war recruiting to go on, the companies to be increased to 250 men; so that a colonel will command 12 companies of 250 men each in time of war, making 3,000 men commanded by a colonel. Now, it seems to me that is absurd. If we want to follow the advice of the Secretary of War and these eminent strategists and follow the lines of modern warfare, we should adopt the opposite policy.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OGDEN. I have five minutes from the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. OGDEN. As I was going on to say, if we adopt this bill as brought in by the committee, we increase the number of enlisted men under the command of the company officer to three times what it is at present. In other words, a company officer who formerly, when he went into battle, commanded 15 men would command 60 men under this bill. The captain would command 250 men instead of 100 men, and the colonel would command 3,000 men instead of 1,000 men. If it was difficult for a colonel to command a regiment of 1,000 men under the old double-line formation, it would be impossible for him to control the movements of a regiment of 3,000 men under the skirmish-line formation.

Now, I think that if they want to reorganize the Army, as we have 25 infantry regiments and 10 companies to a regiment, making 250 companies, all that would be necessary would be to divide these 250 companies into battalion organizations of 12 companies each.

If it is necessary to give them an additional major or an additional lieutenant or two additional lieutenants to complete this more efficient organization of the Army, it ought to be done; and then we ought to stop there. All that is necessary to be done is to change from the ten-company organization to the twelve-company organization.

I grant what the gentleman from Illinois has said and the gentleman from Iowa has said in regard to the efficiency of the volunteer force of this country. I agree with them perfectly that if war is to come and additional force is needed, the war will and ought to be fought by the volunteer forces of this country; and I will never agree that in times of war the right to fight the battles of the country shall be taken from the volunteers of the country and put into the hands of the standing Army of the United States. We do not need the increase of a single man in war or in peace in the standing Army of the United States. We have no Indian wars. What use have we for even 25,000 troops in time of peace, and in time of war we have 25,000 men already organized.

What do we want with an increase of the standing Army? Oh, gentlemen, the belief is prevalent in this House, I know, that for years attempts have been made to increase the standing Army, and you are taking advantage of a probable war with Spain to bring about an increase of the Army, to be used as a police force in the interests of the trusts and corporations. I do not want to increase by a single man the standing Army in time of peace or war. In peace we do not need any, and if war comes, our dependence will be, as in the past, in the volunteer organizations of the country.

Now, I am willing to vote for that part of the bill to give authority to reorganize the Army into the three-battalion formation, especially the infantry.

Take the 25 regiments of 10 companies each and organize them into 20 regiments of 12 companies each, with a maximum of 100 enlisted men to each company; add such additional field officers as may be necessary under the battalion formation, and you have accomplished all the reorganization that is needed to meet the necessities or requirements of modern warfare.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield five minutes to my colleague [Mr. COCHRAN].

[Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I think it is hardly necessary to add anything to what has been so well said on both sides of the Chamber in opposition to this bill. It is obvious to me that this House will, by an overwhelming vote, reject the measure. The only proposition which now seems to offer any hope of saving any part of the bill is the one suggested by the gentleman from Iowa and others, looking to the amendment of the measure.

Mr. Speaker, if the bill is to be amended, I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that the bill should be recommitted to the committee, and after careful consideration again reported to the House. I think in that way, in view of the discussion already had, the committee will be able to report a suitable measure which will receive the approval of the House, provided always that the standing army is not increased either in time of peace or time of war.

Mr. Speaker, this is not an emergency measure. It does not increase the standing army in time of peace, but it proposes to increase the standing army in time of war from about 27,000 men to about 105,000 men. I am opposed to this increase in the Regular Army of 78,000 men, because the United States in all its wars has largely relied upon the volunteer soldiery, and has fought its battles and achieved its triumphs with their aid.

We relied upon the volunteers in the war of 1812; we called for the volunteers in the war with Mexico, in all the Indian wars, and in the late civil war. The volunteer soldiery has always supplemented the Regular Army and fought our battles, and if there is to be war with Spain, if our flag is to float in victory upon the Island of Cuba, it should be sustained and upheld by the volunteer soldiers of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, this bill authorizes an increase of the Regular Army in time of war to the extent of about 78,000 men. I object to it because, to that extent, it stands in the way of the rugged yeomanry from Iowa, from Missouri, from Illinois, from the great Northwest, from the Northeast, and from other sections of the Union, who desire to defend the flag if there is to be war with Spain. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I trust the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] will consent at this time that the bill may be recommitted and reconstructed. I am satisfied that the House will then approve it, provided there is no authority to increase the Regular Army in war or peace.

Mr. HULL. The bill is now before the House, and the committee are perfectly willing to hear the objections of the gentleman from Missouri so far as the increase of the number of companies is concerned. Why not let us amend the bill to meet the views of a majority of the House?

Mr. DOCKERY. Because I do not believe in that way the measure can be properly perfected. The whole bill should be reconstructed. If reconstructed on the line of this discussion and no increase is made in the Regular Army, I think the House will approve it.

Mr. HULL. The present law on the statute books of the United States places the Regular Army in the time of peace at 26,010, in round numbers. The present law on the statute books of the United States provides for an increase between a peace footing and a war footing, making, in round numbers, the Regular Army of about 48,000 men. Does the gentleman want us to bring in a bill providing that in time of war there shall be no increase in the Regular Army over what we have to-day?

Mr. DOCKERY. I am speaking for myself only. I do not desire the Regular Army increased in time of war. I insist that this nation should rely upon the volunteer soldiery. Let me state the effect of the bill: Under its provisions the men who enlist in the Regular Army from Missouri, from Iowa, from Illinois, from Maine, and from other States must enlist as privates. They must go upon the muster roll as privates, to be officered by the officers of the Regular Army.

Mr. HULL. Do you not do that under the law as it is now?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly, Mr. Speaker; but the Regular Army is small, and I do not desire it increased, because our people should have the opportunity not only to enlist as privates but also to enlist as officers.

Mr. HULL. According to that theory, if the committee should bring in a bill on the lines that the gentleman suggests, we would be obliged, in order to have the modern formation, to cut the number of regiments in two.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with the details of army organization. I am not an expert in military matters; but I oppose the increase of the Regular Army either in time of peace or in time of war. If we are to have war, let the Government call upon our heroic volunteers to aid the Regular Army. [Applause.]

Mr. TALBERT. It has been stated here by different members that in case of war this bill, if it should be in operation, would destroy the militia organization—the National Guard. I should like the gentleman from Missouri to explain in what way the bill will dismember or disorganize the militia of the States.

Mr. DOCKERY. Simply by denying them the privilege of "doing business."

Mr. TALBERT. Then it takes their business out of their hands?

Mr. DOCKERY. It commits to the Regular Army the duty of fighting our battles, to the extent at least of the proposed increase of 78,000 men. It thus takes away from the National Guard the incentive for maintaining its organization.

Mr. ROBBINS. And there can not be enlistments in the Regular Army beyond the number of 104,000.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is true. I think the bill should be recommitted, that it may be perfected before it is again brought into the House. I should be glad if we could have unanimous consent at this time to test the sentiment of the House upon a simple motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. FLEMING. Let us have a vote on that.

Mr. HULL. I object to that, because I believe that the bill can be perfected and voted upon in the House. If we fail in that effort, it will then be time enough to recommit the bill.

Mr. MARSH. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Missouri whether, in cutting down the number of men that this bill contemplates as an increase of the force of the Regular Army, the proposed increase of officers should not also be largely cut down. Something more than 750 new officers are provided for in the bill, and if there is to be, as suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, no increase in the number of enlisted men, it is a question whether there should be any increase of the officers.

Mr. DOCKERY. There ought not to be. I am not criticising the committee; I know that it has presented the best measure it could devise. But the bill is not in harmony with the sentiment on both sides of this Chamber, unless I am wholly mistaken. I have conversed with a number of gentlemen, and I believe the sentiment is practically unanimous against the bill.

Mr. HULL. I do not believe there is any division of sentiment on this subject if we do not increase the number of men in the Army. If the present force, without any increase, be simply put on a war footing, then there will be no increase of officers provided for in the bill except the twenty-five majors. I believe there is no difference of opinion on this side as to the part of the bill in which I am particularly interested, which is the modern formation—the battalion formation.

Mr. OGDEN. Right there, let us get down to something practical. There are twenty-five regiments——

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. OGDEN] for a question.

Mr. OGDEN. I have been through one war; and I want to put a question to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] which may elicit something practical. There are twenty-five infantry regiments, I believe?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. OGDEN. They are composed of 10 companies each?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. OGDEN. That will make 250 companies. Now, if we should adopt the three-battalion organization, consisting of 12 companies, that would of necessity reduce the number of regiments, but not change the number of companies; or, if you add 2 companies and continue the same number of regiments, it would add one-sixth to the force as at present constituted. Now I will ask the gentleman which proposition he would make if we should go on now and amend the bill?

Mr. HULL. I would make the proposition to adhere to the twelve-company organization and the 25 regiments of infantry.

Mr. OGDEN. That, then, would increase the present force 2 companies to each regiment, which would give 50 additional companies?

Mr. HULL. It would.

Mr. OGDEN. Making an addition of 5,000 men to the Regular Army?

Mr. HULL. Yes; in time of war.

Mr. OGDEN. That is a reason to recommit the bill and let the committee reconstruct it and meet the views of those who are opposed to an increase of the Army. We are willing to vote for the three-battalion organization suggested by the bill, but we are opposed absolutely to any increase in the Army.

Mr. HULL. I have no question but that the committee, if they reconstructed the bill at all, would bring it back with a change by adding two companies to each infantry regiment. It does not increase the companies in the cavalry or in the artillery regiments, but only makes the increase of two companies in the infantry regiments.

Mr. DOCKERY. Does the gentleman object to a request to be submitted now for unanimous consent to test the sense of the House on a motion to recommit the bill?

Mr. HULL. I would most certainly object to it at this time.

Mr. DOCKERY. Why?

Mr. HULL. Because so many members have left the House, not expecting a vote to be taken upon it at this time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. HULL. Well, the gentleman from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if the provision contained in the bill as to the reorganization is solely embodied in section 1 of the bill?

Mr. HULL. It is in sections 1 and 2 of the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Section 2 says:

SEC. 2. That upon a declaration of war by Congress, or a declaration by Congress that war exists, the President, in his discretion, may establish a third battalion for each infantry regiment, consisting of four companies, to be supplied by manning the two skeleton companies, and by organizing two additional companies.

Now, is that all that relates to organization in the bill?

Mr. HULL. That relates to the third battalion.

The first section of the bill provides for taking the eight companies and dividing them into two battalions.

Section 2 provides for the organization of the third battalion in time of war.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then the provisions are contained in the first and second sections of the bill?

Mr. HULL. Mainly, or largely so. The others relate to the numbers of companies, the manner of disposing of them, and various matters of that kind.

Now, you can reenact, so far as I am concerned, the present law as to the questions involved here, provided you will give us the three-battalion organization, and the bill, even modified in that respect, as it would be would still be an excellent one.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. As I understand it, these two companies, of which mention is made here, simply consist of officers and not men, which are to form the nucleus of the third battalion.

Mr. HULL. Yes. But this bill does not change the old provision. We have that enactment now.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Well, we have no use for it.

Mr. HULL. That may be; but we have that provision of law just the same.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. And that section is carried forward in section 2?

Mr. HULL. It is provided that these companies are to be fully organized, but it does not change the ten-company provision. It leaves that just as it is now.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. How, then, do you propose to fill up the regiments—by voluntary enlistment?

Mr. HULL. Just as is provided under the present law. If the President calls for volunteers for the Regular Army, the States are called upon, and the number of troops necessary is specified according to their population. But if the President is to call for troops outside of the Regular Army, the Congress must first authorize him to do it. The minute that Congress does that it would take precedence over anything else, and the State troops would be organized as they were organized during the last war, and as the provision of the present law authorizes their organization.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. As under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. HULL. This has nothing to do with the volunteer troops. They are organized under the present law. If we pass a bill or a joint resolution to-morrow authorizing the President to call for volunteers, he would apportion them among the various States, and under present conditions the most of the States have a better organization than the Regular Army.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. The gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. GRIFFIN was recognized.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to move to recommit the bill, Mr. Speaker, if it be in order.

The SPEAKER. The trouble is that if it was in order the gentleman's time has expired, and the Chair has recognized the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GRIFFIN].

Mr. HULL. I think that motion would not be in order anyway, Mr. Speaker, until the bill is on its third reading.

Mr. DOCKERY. The Chair holds the motion to be in order.

Mr. HULL. I hardly think it fair to make the motion with so many members absent from the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired, and the Chair has already recognized the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, whatever the fate of this bill may ultimately be, it is self-evident that the people of this country, through their representatives on this floor, are exceedingly sensitive with respect to any increase of the armed force of this country. Very much of this sensitiveness and much of this adverse sentiment comes from a misapprehension of the provisions of this bill. This entire debate has proceeded upon the line of the National Guard in opposition to the permanent establishment in the military forces of this country.

For one I exceedingly regret that such should have been the character of the debate. No man upon this floor has greater respect for or interest in the National Guard than I have. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but there is no organization that I know of to-day that shall perpetuate my name save an organization in the National Guard of my State. So I have watched the progress, the advancement, the development of the National Guard in my State for so many years that it seems to me as if I were to-day a part of it, and I regret exceedingly that the Committee on Military Affairs of this House should have been charged with bringing in a bill here antagonistic to the interests of the National Guard in the various States of this Union. That, sir, was not our purpose nor our object, and we deny that it is accomplished by the terms of this bill.

The argument which has been made here in opposition to the bill is an argument in favor of disbanding the permanent establishment and doing away with it for all time. Who, sir, is willing to place himself upon record as being in favor of a proposition of that kind? One gentleman was so extreme in his remarks as to say that in time of war we had less use for the Regular Army than in time of peace. To my mind, having had a little experience in war, it seems almost impossible for me to reconcile that with rational ideas.

In time of war, if the war be sufficiently extensive, as we have reason to apprehend that it might be at some time in the history of this country, the Regular Army will be just as much needed as the volunteers, and the volunteers just as much as the Regular Army. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to overcome, if I can, this seeming prejudice and contention which it has been endeavored to build up here to-day as between the Regular Army and the National Guards, who would constitute the volunteer forces of this country, as the rolls now show, to the number of 114,000 enlisted men.

Sir, we want to foster both, within proper limitations. And this bill, to my mind, does not infringe upon that principle. It only increases the Regular Army about 56,000 men in time of war beyond what the law now provides. Surely in a great country like ours, with 70,000,000 people, no one could object to 56,000 men of our good citizens being added if they were added to the military forces of this country in time of peace.

Now, sir, we ought to take this bill and consider its operations as a practical question. It has been contended here that the passage or enactment of such a law as this would deprive the volunteer soldiers of this country of the right to do duty and perform service for the country. I am one of those who believe that in case of war, if this bill should become the statute law of the country, not one-tenth, nay, not one-thirtieth, of that increase would come to the Regular Army.

Why? Because, as has been suggested here in this debate, men who are willing to serve under the old flag prefer to serve with the State organization; and when the President of the United States, in view of an emergency—and I am speaking altogether in an abstract sense—calls for men to enlist, he establishes his recruiting offices, and if there be prospect of war which would necessitate the calling out of a large force of men, American citizens are sufficiently intelligent to comprehend the situation, and the desire to serve in their own State regiments would be so great that every man would say, "Well, if we do not enlist in the Regular Army, which is not as desirable for us, because we are only going to serve during the war, we shall have an opportunity to serve in volunteer regiments from our own States." And there, Mr. Speaker, is an obstacle in the very sense and sentiment of the American people to any large increase in the Regular Army under the provisions of such a bill as this would be if it should become a law.

Some have suggested, "Well, the President of the United States might order a draft." But, sir, before any Chief Executive of this nation will undertake to fill up the ranks of the Regular Army by a draft in any State of this Union, the governor of that State would say, "Mr. President, my State is prepared to furnish its quota of men as volunteers, but is not willing to see its citizens drafted when it stands ready with many more men than you need to meet your requisition."

In that I can see safety and a safeguard that these gentlemen who do not stop to analyze the provisions of this bill have perhaps overlooked. I will confess that I am not one of those who are afraid of the military establishment of the United States. I have never yet seen or apprehended any danger that might possibly flow from the maintenance of a national police force in this country, and that is all there is of the handful of men now serving in the Regular Army.

But, sir, in the volunteer force of this country to-day, that so many eulogize, and that I am willing to eulogize, we have a representation of the men who more than a third of a century ago shouldered their muskets in defense of our country and who preserved the honor of its flag. They are the prototypes of what the men in 1861 to 1865 were, on both sides of that unfortunate contest; and, sir, we need nothing more than to read the history of this country, and point out the examples of heroism which were performed during those four misguided years, in order to have our admiration for the volunteer soldier occupy the highest plane in the country's history.

Nor, sir, while I am doing that do I forget that those who served in the Regular Army were men who maintained the honor of this country and their own reputation as heroes. Now, sir, the National Guard and the Regular Army have for many years worked and operated in harmony in this country. The officers of the National Guard and the officers of the Regular Army—nay, more, I may say the noncommissioned officers of the Regular Army—have worked together under a system of education in the lines of military training and teaching and discipline which have made both better than they otherwise would have been. And, sir, when they talk about the men who serve in the National Guard of the various States being a better class of men than the Regular Army, I want to call their attention to the fact that to-day and for the past few years the standard has been gradually elevated in selecting and accepting men to serve in the Regular Army.

Neither the officers of to-day nor the enlisted men in the Regular Army occupy the same plane as they did years ago. There were times in the history of this country when the Regular Army officer looked upon the National Guardsman as something beneath his attention. To-day they recognize them as their equals; and I agree with the sentiment expressed here, that in many cases they are their superiors. But, sir, it will not become us to deny the fact that we have in the Regular Army to-day just as good men, just as good officers, as any nation on the face of the globe could desire. I am not here to disparage by invidious comparison the standing of any of our citizens, let them be in the uniform of a soldier or be a private citizen.

We have in this Chamber to-day created that which may result in contentions between the Regular Army and the National Guard. That system of beneficial education in a military way which has been inaugurated and in force in this country for many years by the efforts of broad-minded men, by the efforts of men who have appreciated the fact that in time of need the National Guard was the reliance; that that system from this time on, because of the unfortunate sentiment which has been expressed here, the two arms of the service may be at variance, and the country deprived of the benefit which would otherwise have resulted. Sir, the National Guard to-day—and I speak advisedly, because I have been in touch with that organization for many years—the National Guard to-day owes much of its proficiency, much of its superiority, to the education and the example and to the discipline of men in the permanent establishment.

Now, sir, if these gentlemen are not afraid of an increase in time of war of 56,000 men in the Regular Army, there is nothing in this bill to which they can object. If you are not afraid of 56,000 men added to the 48,000, to which even under the present law the present Army may be increased, why then there is nothing for you to fear. But if you are, then you ought to vote against this bill or that provision of the bill, and yet it requires a practical test and a practical application of such a law to determine the proposition which I laid down, that with a prospect of war, as the law is, you would utterly fail to increase your Army one-thirtieth part of the number that you stand in fear of.

One of the greatest difficulties in case of war with the President would be the very same sentiment that is advanced by gentlemen upon the floor of this House, that the sentiment of the country is not sustained here in trying to fill the ranks of the Regular Army to 104,000 or to increase by 56,000 above what the present law provides for. Those who do not see any safety in that advance have a further objection to the increase in the military establishment of this country to the number mentioned. They are opposed to this bill. It is a desirable measure in case of emergency. The bill contains proper limitations for the reduction of the Army when the exigency is passed. It is immediately required by this bill that the Army shall be reduced to a peace footing of 26,610 men. It can no longer exist upon a war footing. Now, sir, so far as the increase from 48,000 to 104,000 is concerned, to that extent, and to that extent alone, it decreases the opportunities for the National Guard to serve their country. In other words, if in time of war under a law of this kind 104,000 men were sufficient, and if these men could be secured upon enlistments in the Regular Army, the National Guard or the volunteer forces of this country would not be called upon to serve.

There is no desire on the part of this committee or any member of the committee to conceal or mislead any member of this House. This proposition is presented fairly and squarely to the consideration and the intelligent judgment of the members. It is for this House to say whether they would rather be limited in time of war, in time of great emergency, when quick work would have to be accomplished—it is for them to say whether they would rather the President should be deprived of the right to increase the Regular Army so as to admit of volunteer forces of the State, or vice versa.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Do you think in case of an emergency it would be quicker, more expeditious, to fill up the regiments by recruits than to call on the States for volunteers?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No, sir.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. That is what you did say.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will say right there that that is the protection of the men who entertained the views that the Regular Army ought not to be increased in time of war under such a bill as this. Enlistment in the Regular Army under these circumstances would be so slow that it would be impossible for the President of the United States to thus cooperate——

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Then you give away your whole case, according to your own argument, because you admit that you have got to rely upon the volunteer forces to serve the country in case of emergency.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I admit the President of the United States would accept such as came to the Regular Army under this bill, and if they did not come fast enough he would call upon the volunteers.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. I call upon the members of the House to witness that the gentleman has given away his case, because he admits the fact that the Government at last, in the case of an emergency, must rely upon the citizen soldiery of the country to save the national honor. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Did you ever find a condition differing from that?

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. No, sir; I never did; that is why I oppose this bill.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Then my statement is perfectly consistent with the passage of this bill.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. No, sir; I deny that it is consistent, and I want to say to you——

Mr. GRIFFIN. I object to the gentleman making a statement; I object to the gentleman interfering with my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I decline to yield to a gentleman who misstates the situation.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. I deny that I have——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi (continuing). Misstated the situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin declines to yield. Will the gentleman from Mississippi resume his seat?

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman is extremely sensitive as to what the bill may do. I say it is proper that the power should be lodged in the Chief Executive of the nation, and if he can acquire sufficient troops, sufficient additions to the Regular Army, to insure the purposes of the occasion, he should have that privilege. I am in favor of the Chief Executive enjoying the power which will enable him to take care of this country and maintain a proper defense of it.

If the bill, or a measure such as this, fails to meet the exigency, then he has the other privilege of calling upon the States for volunteers. Sir, that is practically the method which has heretofore been pursued. I regret that gentlemen should be so sensitive, so supersensitive, on this subject, when no harm can occur. Does any gentleman on this floor believe that the Chief Executive would call into requisition a larger army than that which would meet the needs and necessities of the occasion? If he does, then it is proper for him to oppose this measure.

If he lacks that confidence in the Chief Executive of the nation when such an emergency may arise, no matter who he may be—if they lack confidence in him, then he should not only oppose this measure, but he should ask that the present Regular Army be disbanded. Sir, it belongs to the national characteristic that every nation in its regular and permanent military establishment should have a sufficient force to protect and defend it in the time of need. Any other policy leaves the nation exposed to foreign foes; leaves it exposed to the enemies who might assault the Government without any means and without any opportunities for that nation to protect itself and its great interests.

I do not believe in that line of policy. Notwithstanding that we have so many men qualified for military duty—and at the present time there are 10,000,000 men in the United States who are so qualified—I care not how many you have, unless you have a sufficient force maintained and in training, that can be called upon in an instant to respond to the order of the Chief Executive, you are a feeble, weak nation. The American people do not want to be placed in that attitude. They do not want to build up a reputation of that kind. They are great and strong in every other characteristic, and it is not to their discredit that they are willing to maintain a proper, permanent establishment for self-defense.

All the efforts which have been made in opposition to this bill have proceeded on lines of legislation in the interest of the National Guard. It ought to be recognized as a fact (for it is a fact) that this bill does not to any extent or in any manner legislate in the interest of the National Guard.

Mr. HULL. Or against them, either.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Or against them. Sir, when legislation in the interest of the National Guard is presented here, there will be no one on this floor who will be as ready to support it as I. And, Mr. Speaker, I regret that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH], who is chairman of the Committee on the Militia, has not used his influence to increase the appropriation proposed by his bill for the maintenance of the National Guard. The men who have for years served in that organization have made greater sacrifice for the benefit of this country in the way of becoming educated in military tactics and discipline that they may be ready to serve the country in time of need than has yet been recognized by the nation at large. And, sir, I shall be ready, if the gentleman from Illinois will amend his bill, to aid the National Guard by increasing the annual appropriation for its maintenance from $400,000, as proposed in the bill reported, to $1,000,000, as it should be. [Applause.]

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Certainly.

Mr. MARSH. I wish to say that the committee has authorized me to offer that amendment to the bill now pending in the House.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am very much pleased, Mr. Speaker, to have that assurance. I know that the National Guard throughout this country will thank that gentleman and his committee; and he also has my personal thanks, because just as long as I live I will be a friend of the National Guard of my State and of all the States regardless of the permanent military establishment of this country.

Some intimations have crept out in this debate which would lead one to philosophize a little on this subject. If we consider the interests of all kinds of organizations and all kinds of men and all sections of this country, without reference to the interests of the entire body of our people, and try to frame a measure which shall satisfy every locality, every organization, and every individual, legislation would be practically out of the question. One gentleman states in this House that he has an application for an organization of a cowboy regiment. Now, this bill might have interfered with that.

He also makes the statement that he has an application expressing a desire to organize a miners' regiment; and he thinks that under the provisions of this bill he could not have that opportunity. But when these States are called upon for volunteer forces, the governors direct the forces that are to fill that requisition on the part of the President. Those regiments may be known as cowboy regiments, or miners' regiments, or regiments of retail clerks, or any other designation; but, sir, when they mingle with and become a part of the military organization of this country in time of war, constituting the volunteer forces of the country, their organization then receives a number with the name of the State, and they are no longer known as "cowboy regiments" or "miners' regiments" or anything of that kind, except among those who may desire to preserve their identity in history by using the original names of the organizations.

A name amounts to nothing. The history of glorious deeds, the history of valor, may as well cluster around a number with the name of the State from which the organization emanated as around the designation "Cowboy Regiment" or "Miners' Regiment." When that time comes, men are not measured by the occupations in which they may have been engaged. The country, then, is looking for men who will serve it well—men who will maintain its honor. And I concede there is no class of men who will do it better than the volunteer forces of the country. Whatever may be the fate of this bill, when the time comes, if it ever does, when the volunteer forces shall be called in to aid the Regular Army, I have no doubt that each organization will vie with all the others to see which can render the best, the highest, the most effective service to their country and its cause. And with that object in view this bill has been prepared.

Why, Mr. Speaker, efforts have been made ever since the year 1883 to effect the three-battalion organization in infantry regiments. It has been recommended by every Secretary of War since that time. It has been recommended by those who held the positions of General and Lieutenant-General in the armies of the United States. Bills have been prepared and introduced for the accomplishment of that object. But the developments of to-day have indicated why those efforts have not met with favorable response on the part of Congress.

While gentlemen entertain views so adverse to military legislation for the benefit of this country, just so long we shall be unable to effect that organization. And yet Persia, China, and the United States are the only known countries to-day whose infantry organizations consist of two battalions in a regiment. It is time, sir, that in this respect we made the three arms of our service harmonious. With the passage of the first and second sections of this bill that object will be accomplished. Without it the Army will go on in its present inefficient and cumbersome condition until the necessities of war at some time in the future compel a reorganization and readjustment upon the lines of the first two sections of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. MARSH. Before the gentleman from Wisconsin takes his seat, I would like to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey has been recognized.

Mr. MARSH. I hope the gentleman will allow me to interrupt for a moment.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I would be very glad to do so, but I need all the time at my command.

Mr. Speaker, this bill, so far as it relates to doubling up the Army from within each company and to crediting the recruits of the Regular Army to the various States, is no emergency measure. If any member who is interested will look at report No. 2520, in the second session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, he will find a report which was prepared by a then member of the committee in favor of these two matters. I will deal with the second of them first; that is, the localizing of the recruitments of the Regular Army.

I want to call your attention in this connection to a matter of history. Our Regular Army has always been the nucleus, and at first the fighting line, in time of war. We depend afterwards upon the National Guard for the fighting. I am a member of the National Guard myself, and I have never introduced a bill, and never will introduce a bill, against it. [Applause.]

I believe in the militia—Jefferson's militia—mentioned by gentlemen in the discussion of this bill to-day. We stand ready at the beck and call of the President of the United States whenever in his judgment our services are necessary to repel invasion and to suppress insurrection, just as much as the Regular Army. [Applause.]

The Military Committee ask only that the Regular Army be given an equal chance. During the late war the regiments of the Regular Army went down to skeletons, not because men did not want to go into them to enlist under tried, able, accomplished, and good officers, under the old and recognized leaders of the Regular Army, but the regiments went down to skeleton organizations because the quotas enlisted were not credited to the States, and the States therefore preferred to put their men into the volunteer forces.

As a consequence, the Regular Army got comparatively no recruits. This bill allows such a credit, and, as I have said already, it localizes the recruitments of the Regular Army. This is not the least important item in the make-up of the bill. If two friends can come together from the same neighborhood and from the same town, join the same company, and it is known that men from that neighborhood will be allowed to enlist in such a regiment of the infantry or cavalry, as the case may be, then local pride and fellowship is enlisted, the quota of the States can be brought up, and men will go into regiments where they have friends and neighbors.

This plan is followed in every other army in the world. Why should it not be done with us? They have, for instance, county regiments in England, and regiments representing the various kingdoms in Germany. Not that they do not represent the Empire or the Government, but that they represent the local pride of the people. We now have one regiment of artillery that is composed chiefly of men from a single State. In that regiment there are few cases of desertion, because these men do not dare to go home and meet other men from that regiment or their neighbors.

The provision for local recruiting is in section 5 of the pending bill. As originally drafted, it went further and ordered the name of the State to be put on the regimental flag. This provision was omitted because of the opposition of the Army authorities, but it will be done if we get in a war, when it is recognized that the men from a certain State are represented exclusively in one regiment.

It is, however, provided in the bill that each regiment of the Army may draw its recruits from such State or States as may be designated by the President, and that such recruits shall be credited to such State or Territory, including the District of Columbia, upon its proportional quota. Now, it is hard to see why the bill was amended so as to forbid that any State bounty shall be paid such recruits. The States should be encouraged to put their best men into either regular or militia service, and they should be properly represented in the Army of the United States. State pride in the regiment would make enlistment popular, as in the volunteers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I pass to the provision authorizing the Regular Army to be increased from within in time of war. Let us again look at history. In the war between the States—that sad struggle—we sent out regiment after regiment, and as the men were killed off or disabled and the regiment reduced in numbers another regiment would come in under untried officers from the same State. The veteran regiments were skeletons and the new regiments useless.

That system was found bad, and after a while both sides, the Southern army and the Northern army, learned from the sheer force of experience what was best to be done under the circumstances. They put new men into old regiments. Only the old regiments were trusted. At Gettysburg there were a hundred thousand new men, and they were not regarded as worth anything, although they had been drilling.

What did they know about the marching, what about the camping, what about the fighting, and what about meeting the enemy? They were not veterans. We relied on the veteran regiments in which the same raw men, put in alongside of the old men, were veterans. We stand now as we did at the outbreak of the great war. We have veterans among us, but they are old, and age counts in an army. Only Heaven knows how many of us are fit to take our places in the fighting line.

We have to consider the fact that we might have to meet a first-class power. When this bill was drawn there was not a cloud in the sky. There are powers who could land sixty or seventy or eighty thousand disciplined troops, men who know how to march, camp, and fight. On the other hand, we have 25,000 disciplined men, under good officers, who know the business of the camp, the march, and the supply of food, men who have been in Indian fighting. In this Army we can put the new man alongside of the old.

More than that, we could often put the old man alongside of the old; the man who has served in the Army and been discharged honorably, who is ready to take his place again alongside of his comrades. Such regiments, if shipped to Cuba, will be seasoned regiments, used to marching and camping; men who will not be drowned out in camp because they do not know how to dig a ditch, who will not be caught in ambuscades, because they go under tried officers who know what fighting is; men who are ready to make the first line. True, it is only the first line.

What we need is at least 50,000 men, or, better, seventy-five or one hundred thousand men, as provided by this bill, of whom some at least have had experience how to fight, as well as how to drill in a particular battalion organization; men who are ready to take the first brunt of the conflict, while the National Guard, called out at the same time, are in the field and are being taught by experience and are learning under their officers the demands of actual warfare. Shame on the idea that would disparage our Regular Army! [Applause.]

On it we of the National Guard pattern ourselves. True, the volunteers draw from the best blood of the country, but go to Fort Myer and tell me if the young men in the Regular Army are anything but solid, energetic Americans, even if they have not been to college. The officers are devoted to their duty. They know their men, and are what we need as a first fighting line. We do not want to go into a war again with nothing but 20,000 men who know anything about the requirements of warfare. There is no army in the world that finds it possible to keep in the ranks all the men it means to call there.

Germany puts all its infantrymen through the course of service in two years, and half of them are new every year, but there are three times as many more to fill up the ranks, to double the companies at the beginning, and to fill the ranks as the men drop out. Those companies in war are 250 strong, twice the peace strength. The same reserve system should exist in the National Guards. Why should we be enlisting men for two, three, four, or five years and then letting them go back into society, and not have the right to call them back again? Their active service should be only a training to enable them to come back again into the old regiment.

The same provision for increasing the regiment must belong to the National Guard which we found necessary for the volunteers in the last war. We need the same principle in the Army. A hundred thousand men are but a flea-bite in a great war. They are only the leaders. We want the same system in the National Guard—to call back the trained guardsmen into the ranks, to double up the companies, to put in under the present active officers all those who have had the training of that Guard, and to make that Guard three times as large as it is.

It is only a little over 100,000 men now. It ought to be able to expand to 500,000 men, with all the training that has been given to the number who are now in civil life. This bill is not aimed against the National Guards. It is a bill to enable the Regular Army to become an effective fighting force. It is also a bill which, when adopted by the States with reference to their own enlistments, will make the National Guard a tremendous fighting force instead of being regarded as a plaything. It will make every man know that when he enlists in that Guard for two years he really enlists for ten—two or three years in active service and the rest in reserve.

It means that instead of depending on untrained volunteers, with politicians as their leaders, we shall depend upon a trained National Guard; not only upon its active ranks, but upon its reserve, ready to go into the conflict. I am astounded at the objections made to this bill. Increase the efficiency and strength of the Regular Army and you increase the military spirit throughout the whole nation. Give that Army the power to fill itself up from within, and then, in time of necessity, you put the reserve line in alongside of the trained soldiers.

Do that by the Regular Army and you will soon have the same plan adopted by the National Guard. The two organizations work together on the same lines. They stand together as the defense of this country, but that defense, when once encouraged by a proper system, using all the strength of State pride, yielding all credit to the State for every man that goes into the service of his country, either in the Regular Army or in the volunteers, adopting the methods adopted by every warlike country in the world, in having an active service and a reserve, so that it can fill its ranks in case of necessity with trained men—I say these two organizations make up an army that needs no further training than the hard work which untrained men get in the field. Give them three months of that, and I say it would be an army before which the army of any Government in the world, no matter how strong it be, would quail.

Mr. LOVE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will.

Mr. LOVE. My question is this: I understand this provides for an increase of officers in case of war?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Very little.

Mr. LOVE. Then, after the war is over, would there be any necessity for them? It provides that the soldiers shall be mustered out.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The increase in the officers is almost infinitesimal. There are more or less losses as the result of war, even if they have no fighting. Men always drop out. The only increase is in the second lieutenant in each company of infantry, which makes about one new officer in eight, so that with the changes that take place in war there would be at the end of the war practically no increase of officers.

Mr. MARSH. It increases the number of officers about 750.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. MARSH. And you assume that many of them would be killed or die?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I mean to say that they would——

Mr. MARSH. Those places would be filled as soon as the vacancies occurred.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. MARSH. So the number at the close of the war would be full.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It might stand at 750.

Mr. HULL. Would it not also, so far as the number of the Army is concerned, save between three and four millions in cost?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes. But I have regarded the question of cost as entirely subordinate to the question of efficiency. The benefit of having new men in line with the trained men, who can each teach his comrade how to pitch his tent and manage his business, is great. I disclaim to my friend from Illinois, whose earnestness I recognize and with whom I have not had a chance to talk, any idea of doing without volunteers. But the Regular Army must be used while they are in training.

Mr. MARSH. One more question. The gentleman says they are not trained. Are there not a hundred thousand of the National Guard of this country that are as well prepared as the volunteer regiments were in the civil war after six months' service?

Mr. STEELE. Oh, no.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Perhaps they are as well drilled to the use of the musket and in the ordinary work of drilling, but if the gentleman means to tell me that they are used to marches of 25 to 30 miles in a day, I will say, from what I have seen of the National Guard, they are not, nor have they the trained officers of the Regular Army, nor its trained soldiers. New men may be put in that Army, and the old men leaven the mass. It makes a veteran regiment by the proportion of veterans with which the recruits have been mixed.

Mr. SIMPSON. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. He is making a very interesting speech. The bill says that in time of peace these officers are to be absorbed. Absorbed by what? What do you understand by that?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. By the ordinary promotion in the Regular Army. They will have gotten undue promotion in time of war, and after that they will have to wait, of course, for their rank, and take promotion as it will come—not so quickly.

Mr. SIMPSON. That is, the officers.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The officers. There will only be a few more to be promoted.

Mr. SIMPSON. The gentleman from Illinois says 750.

Mr. OTEY. Seven hundred and thirty-eight.

Mr. SIMPSON. They are to be absorbed?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. SIMPSON. Absorbed by what?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Absorbed by the ordinary chances of promotion in the service.

Mr. SIMPSON. Would not that stop the chance of promotion, especially when they have a great many more of them?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. We would find that a great many of these men who are capable of service, and who would serve in time of war, would retire in time of peace.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the gentleman from New Jersey allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand by the provisions in this bill, in case we should get into a war and this bill should go into effect, at the close of the war, when the privates are discharged, we should have left an Army of 25,000 men, with officers enough for 105,000 men.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The officers are not increased proportionately. They are increased about one-eighth. There are a great many staff officers connected with every regiment, and we have them in time of peace as in time of war, and then there are the recruiting stations.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; but after the discharge of the privates you would have 25,000 soldiers, with officers enough for 105,000 soldiers.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. You would take off at the end of the war three-quarters of the privates and reduce the officers by about one-eighth. The officers would not be much reduced.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I should like time enough, Mr. Speaker, to answer any questions that may be put to me. I do not want to decline to answer the question of any gentleman.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have sufficient time to answer such questions as may be put to him.

Mr. ROBBINS. The gentleman stated, as I understood him, that the National Guards were not armed and equipped.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The gentleman misunderstood me. I did not say so.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. I say so.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I said that while they are well armed and well equipped and well drilled, they are usually drilled inside of fixed camps, in fixed places, and they are not fully used to pitch their own tents, to find their own food, to make long marches, and do the work of men who have to be soldiers. I am not trained to that, although I am a member of the National Guard, and I am proud of being a National Guardsman.

Mr. ROBBINS. The Pennsylvania National Guard is trained to that; every one of them is an expert marksman; every one of them is uniformed, and every one of them is drilled, and on every occasion when they have been called into service, as in strikes, the commissary department is so complete that they can find subsistence as a company, regiment, or battalion.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I yield to no one in my admiration for the National Guard of Pennsylvania. True, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, it was the result of a strike in 1877, when they were called out, and since that time the organization has been modeled on that of the Regular Army. There is no better National Guard in the country, and I am saying a great deal, for I come from New Jersey, and we are proud of our National Guard.

Mr. MARSH. The gentleman does not know the National Guard of Illinois.

Mr. SIMPSON. And I am sure he is not familiar with the National Guard of Kansas. [Laughter.]

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Well, gentlemen, I take all that back. "Comparisons are odious." Now, does anybody else want to ask me a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. We have a good guard in Tennessee.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is that a question the gentleman asked me?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House do now adjourn. Pending that motion, the Chair will submit to the House the following report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 732. An act granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah A. Denny;

S. R. 105. Joint resolution relative to the appropriation for the Rouge River, Michigan; and

S. 435. An act for the relief of the legal representatives of John C. Howe, deceased.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. STURTEVANT for ten days, on account of important business.

ADMISSION TO GALLERIES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say to members, in regard to carrying out the resolution as to tickets of admission, that they will be found in members' boxes at the post-office to-morrow. The Doorkeeper asked if the order was to be strictly enforced, admission to be only by ticket, and the Chair responded that it was. If it is objectionable, the House must take some action in regard to it.

Mr. FARIS. Will that order of things begin in the morning?

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes so, and hopes for the concurrence of members in the direction he has given.

Mr. FARIS. Ought there not to be some provision made in pursuance of the suggestion that was made about persons going out for luncheon?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has given the Doorkeeper directions in regard to that.

The motion of Mr. HULL was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

MONETARY STANDARD.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I present a paper, being an answer to the usual questions asked by those who advocate the single gold standard, and move that it be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4142) to provide a life-saving station at or near Dollivers Neck, near Gloucester, Mass., reported it with amendments.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 122) to appropriate $200,000 for the widening and deepening of the ship channel in the Bay of Mobile, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4121) for the relief of the estate of Ramsay Crooks, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PROCTOR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4183) for the relief of Leonard I. Brownson, late first lieutenant Company K, Fifth Vermont Volunteers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the amendment relative to the execution of the work of the commissioners appointed by the President to revise and codify the criminal and penal laws of the United States, submitted on the 5th instant, intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, reported it without amendment, and moved that it lie on the table and be printed; which was agreed to.

DISTRICT CAB SERVICE.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 189) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to locate a cab service, and for other purposes, to report it favorably and without amendment.

This joint resolution passed the House of Representatives some days ago, and I ask that it be taken up and acted upon by the Senate at this time. It will take, I think, but a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read at length for information, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to locate on the streets or parts of streets adjoining the stations of any railroad company in the District of Columbia a stand for cabs, carriages, and other vehicles for the conveyance of passengers to and from the said railroad stations, said service to be established by the said railroad companies. That the rates of charges for the service to be rendered by the said railroad companies shall be fixed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and that at no time shall the schedule exceed the rates now in force in the city of New York.

Mr. ALLEN. What are the rates referred to in this joint resolution?

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. I inquire of the Senator what he is endeavoring to regulate by the joint resolution?

Mr. McMILLAN. To regulate the price of the cab service from the railroad stations in this city.

Mr. ALLEN. That is committed to the District Commissioners.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Commissioners are to regulate it, and the rates are not to exceed those charged in New York.

Mr. ALLEN. Can the Senator give us the rates in New York?

Mr. McMILLAN. The rates are established at 25 cents for a single passenger and 40 cents for two passengers.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That depends entirely on the distance for which passengers are carried.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am speaking now about the ordinary distances.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. New York is divided into certain districts, and the fares are regulated according to the district to which a person wishes to go. I confess that I do not see exactly how the rates in the city of New York are to be applicable to the rates in the District of Columbia.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will state that the object of this joint resolution is simply that a passenger arriving at one of the railroad stations in Washington shall be carried at the rate of 25 cents the same distance for which he is now charged 50 cents and frequently a dollar. The intention of the joint resolution is to give us a greatly improved and clean cab service and to furnish cabs fit to be occupied. Most of the cabs which are now around the railroad stations are absolutely unfit for use. If this joint resolution shall be passed, it will assure to the traveling public a cheap and clean cab service.

Mr. ALLEN. There is one fault with the joint resolution. How is a stranger coming to Washington and desiring to be carried from the depot to a hotel or to a private residence to know what are the rates?

Mr. McMILLAN. Under the District regulations the rates are printed on cards, which are posted up in the cabs.

Mr. ALLEN. But in many instances the rates are not carried in the cabs, or, at least if they are, they are concealed.

Mr. McMILLAN. The law compels the rates to be posted up, and the Commissioners require it to be done in all cases.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I should like to have the joint resolution again read.

The joint resolution was again read.

Mr. HAWLEY. I inquire of the chairman of the committee whether the establishment of this service would exclude private competition?

Mr. McMILLAN. It would not.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then I understand it is not proposed to take possession of the entire ground near its depot for cabs by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company?

Mr. McMILLAN. It is not. The Commissioners are authorized to set apart a certain portion of the ground for cabs.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is what I wanted to know. I need not say to gentlemen accustomed to traveling in New York and going to that part of the city, especially from Twenty-third to Forty-second street, that the improvements introduced by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company are most admirable, and it would be very desirable if we could adopt substantially the same thing here.

Mr. SEWELL. I should like to have the joint resolution again read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be again read.

The joint resolution was again read.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the joint resolution whether it gives the railroad company the exclusive right to occupy the cab stands with its cabs?

Mr. McMILLAN. It does not. The intention of the railroad company is to furnish an improved cab service, just as they are doing now in all the great cities, so that when passengers come here they will not be cheated and abused by the cab drivers who hang around the stations at night.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Then this joint resolution does not propose to establish a monopoly?

Mr. McMILLAN. Nothing of the kind. It is simply to control the service.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask if it does not do it indirectly? In other words, will the promiscuous cabs that are running around the streets now have a location there? Are not the Commissioners allowed, or will they not have the power under this joint resolution, to prohibit private cabs from occupying a stand where they can be hired?

Mr. McMILLAN. No. The cab service in the city of Washington is now so arranged by the Commissioners that there are cab stands all over the city. You can get a cab almost anywhere. The joint resolution does not interfere with that. It only allows the company to have certain spaces set apart at the two depots for their cabs, so as to accommodate the traveling public.

Mr. TILLMAN. There will be a space for the city cabs, for the private cabs?

Mr. McMILLAN. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. All right.

Mr. WHITE. If I understand the Senator from Michigan, the idea is simply to set apart a particular locality where the people engaged in this business will be compelled to bring their cabs?

Mr. McMILLAN. No; it does not go so far as that.

Mr. SEWELL. If the Senator from Michigan will allow me to answer, I will say that the character of cabs proposed to be provided under this joint resolution will be such that it would not do to mix them up with those which are now in use. We have in this city the very worst cabs imaginable, particularly around the railroad stations at night. It is not really safe for travelers to get into them. They are dirty, old, and worn out, and the horses are likely to fall down. The railroad corporation would not desire to put their cabs alongside of such cabs alternately; but they have said to the Commissioners that they desire to establish a better service. This will give the company a piece of ground on one side or another, so as to locate their cabs, with a place for private cabs between them. It is the intention to let them all have a fair show; but the railroad company wants a place for its own cab service. That is the idea.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have very great respect for the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia and for any statement which he makes; but it is entirely impossible to convince me that these railroad companies will put up stands here and then allow them to be occupied by anybody else than by their own employees or creatures. If I understand the chairman of the committee, he makes the statement now that these stands are to be put up by the companies and then be free to all owners of cabs.

Mr. FAULKNER. Oh, no.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from West Virginia says "Oh, no;" but that was the statement of the chairman of the committee. He can correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. FAULKNER. I think the Senator from Missouri misunderstood the chairman.

Mr. VEST. Let the chairman make his statement. I certainly understood him in that way.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I will state the difference between this and the original proposition which was before the House of Representatives. The original proposition which was before the House of Representatives provided an exclusive right and required the Commissioners to give an exclusive right to the railroad companies for keeping their cabs within a certain distance from the railroad property. The House defeated that on the ground that it established a monopoly in the railroad cab service. Then this joint resolution was drawn, which avoids that monopoly and simply authorizes the Commissioners to establish a place for this particular cab service. It does not interfere with the right of the Commissioners to establish a different location. There is no erection of buildings or anything of that kind. It is simply the designation of a place where the cabs may stand.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator from West Virginia will permit me, I wish to ask him a question. I am simply seeking information. Will the Senator from West Virginia inform me what the exigencies of the present condition are which justify the intervention of Congress to give to a railroad company a franchise in a public street? Why not permit it to be open for everybody? Why should there be a franchise in favor of a railroad company upon a public highway for carriages or aught else?

Mr. FAULKNER. As Senators well understand, the District Commissioners have no power in these matters except through positive enactment of Congress. They have no discretionary power whatever, unless where it may be so expressly provided. Congress is simply the common council of the District of Columbia.

The cab service at the railroad depots in this city is recognized to be worse than any service in any city where I have ever been. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company has not made a proposition. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company simply asks permission to locate a stand for its cab service at its own depot, not interfering in any way with the establishment of a cab service by other parties. The stands to be selected are adjacent to the depot.

Mr. ALLEN. What is wrong with the present system?

Mr. FAULKNER. At present we have all the rattletrap and broken-down cabs in the city of Washington stationed at the railroad depots. The miserable and broken-down vehicles around the city are taken from the other cab stands and are stationed around the depots.

In addition to that, if ladies or others not familiar with cab rates in Washington arrive at a depot, day or night, and get into one of these cabs, they do not know what will be charged them when they get to their destination. They not only have dirty, filthy cabs to get into, but they have really no indication as to the cost of the service; whereas, under this system as it exists in Philadelphia, in Boston, and in New York, a passenger goes to a man appointed by the railroad company—one of its employees—and secures a cab at a fixed rate to take him to his destination. There can be no cheating; there can be no imposition upon the traveler. The service will be absolutely in the control of the officer appointed by the railroad company at the station, where a person can obtain a cab and know exactly the cost of the service.

In addition to that, we shall, beyond question, get the very best service that is rendered in any form known to the municipalities where such a cab service is used.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have failed to hear any answer to the statement I made in regard to the control of these vehicles and stands by the railroad company. That was the point. I did not yield the floor for any general argument on the question. I understood the chairman of the committee to state that the railroad companies controlled this service, and I see now by the joint resolution in the eighth and ninth lines "said service to be established by the railroad companies." The English language can not be plainer or more energetic than that. The result of it will be unquestionably that the cabs controlled by the railroad companies will have the exclusive use of a certain portion of the street opposite the sidewalk, and the cabs belonging to general owners, to use the expression, outside of the railroad connection, will go to the lower end of the curb.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will ask the Secretary to read the report made in the House of Representatives in reference to this joint resolution. The subject was discussed in the House very fully, and this is the report made there on this very question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The resolution herewith recommended avoids the objectionable feature of a bill granting the sole right to the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad, which was laid upon the table. No exclusive rights are conveyed by the resolution herewith reported, and to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia is granted the full authority, both as to the location of such cab stands and the regulations for the services rendered. It will add to the transportation facilities of the city of Washington to a great degree. The service which is proposed to be established under this bill is similar to that now in use in all of the large cities of the country. It may be said, in conclusion, that the measure has the approbation of the District Commissioners.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia if there is not already a regulation of the cab service here by the District Commissioners?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Are not the rates fixed and are not the cab stands already provided? If that be so, why can not the railroad company compete with private parties in the cab service, put their cabs into service, and let the traveling public understand—those who come in on the trains—that they will give them a clean cab, a nice cab, a respectable cab, an aristocratic cab, if you please, that can go anywhere; but leave the common people an opportunity to compete with the railroad companies, instead of giving the railroad companies the monopoly here?

Mr. ALLEN. Let the joint resolution go over.

Mr. McMILLAN. The number of cabs needed for the railroad service in Washington will be very small.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the present consideration of the joint resolution, and it will go to the Calendar.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL BECOME A LAW.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the bill (S. 432) for the relief of the heirs of Sterling T. Austin, deceased, having been presented to the President on March 24, 1898, and not having been returned to the House of Congress in which it originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, it has become a law without his approval.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WALTHALL introduced a bill (S. 4364) for the relief of John and Sarah Griffin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. QUAY introduced a bill (S. 4365) granting a pension to Jackson Wennel; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment relative to the imposition of an additional tax upon the Capital Traction Company, intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 8656) authorizing and requiring certain extensions to be made to the lines of the Capital Traction Company in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLEN submitted an amendment relative to the election of clerks of district courts in the Territories of Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arizona, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRITCHARD (by request) submitted an amendment relative to the conveying of electric power for the successful operation of electric railroad lines in the District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6148) to amend the charter of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company of the District of Columbia, the Maryland and Washington Railway Company, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART. I submit an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to contract for not less than twenty submarine torpedo boats of the Holland type, etc., intended to be proposed by me to the naval appropriation bill.

In connection with the amendment I present sundry papers, which I move be printed as a document and referred with the amendment to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

COMPENSATION OF POSTMASTERS.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was Ordered, That 250 copies of Senate Report No. 1847, Fifty-first Congress, second session, being a report submitted by Mr. Wilson, of Maryland, December 8, 1890, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to accompany sundry resolutions relating to the compensation of third and fourth class postmasters, be printed for the use of the Senate.

ADDITIONAL CLERK FOR COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be authorized to employ for the remainder of this session an additional clerk, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate at the rate of $1,440 per annum.

THE RIO GRANDE RIVER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

In response to the resolution of the Senate of February 26, 1898, requesting the President "if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate the proceedings of the international commission authorized in the concurrent resolution of Congress of April 29, 1890, and a subsequent international convention between the United States and Mexico of May 6, 1896, and also the correspondence relating thereto with Mexico by the Department of the Interior, Department of War, and Department of Justice, as well as the Department of State, relating to the equitable distribution of the waters of the Rio Grande River, including the draft of an incomplete treaty between said Governments, negotiated between the late Secretary of State, Mr. Olney, on the part of the United States, and Mr. Romero, on the part of Mexico, and all the correspondence between said officials relating thereto," I transmit herewith reports from the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Attorney-General, with accompanying papers.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 7, 1898.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8428) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. PETTUS.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned it had under consideration an amendment which had been proposed to this bill making an appropriation for war and naval purposes and to open the outer bar at Mobile Harbor and the approach to the wharves. There was a question of order talked about. At one time the Senator having charge of the bill suggested that if unanimous consent could be obtained he would waive the point of order. He changed his mind, however, on that subject.

This particular amendment has been recommended by the Secretary of War, and I suppose that will avoid any question of order as to it. If it does not, on reading the last clause of the first rule on amendments to appropriation bills the Chair will see that the recommendation or estimate made by the Secretary of War avoids any point of order that can be made in reference to it.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WILSON. I simply rose to a question of order. I should like to hear what the Senator from Alabama is saying, if possible.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will inform Senators that there is disorder on the floor of the Senate and will request Senators to take their seats.

Mr. WILSON. It is rather embarrassing to call upon the Chair to enforce order, but in this part of the Hall it is impossible for us to hear anything at all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order. The Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. PETTUS. I would prefer that the Senate should be in order. It is the third time I have been interrupted, and I prefer to wait, if the Chair will allow me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will certainly indulge the Senator to the fullest extent, in order that Senators may cease audible conversation on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. I sympathize entirely with the purpose of the Senator from Alabama, and ask him to repeat, if he will, the statement which he began to make a few moments ago to the Senate.

Mr. PETTUS. I will request that the Senate be in order. If any member of the Senate desires ever to have the attention of the Senate, he ought to pay some attention to the request of the Chair and the man on the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate appears to be in order at this moment. The Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. PETTUS. I was saying, Mr. President, that this amendment, which was offered yesterday and was under consideration when the Senate adjourned, has had the approval of the Secretary of War, and the last clause of the rule on this subject expressly provides an exception to the general rule in reference to such amendments—that they are always in order when an estimate has been made by one of the Cabinet, called the head of the Department in the rule. Therefore I hope that the Senator from Iowa will not force us into a discussion of the rule. He ought to allow the amendment to pass without any question as to rules. It is of vast importance to the United States generally, and especially to the people who live on the Gulf.

There is a remarkable feature about this bill. It provides not a cent for the Gulf, although it provides $1,400,000 to dig a highland canal. If any difficulty is to be had with a foreign nation at this time, it will be in the Gulf or in that neighborhood. Here is a provision proposed to be made by which our vessels may obtain absolutely essential supplies, and at the scene of action. I hope the gentleman in charge of the bill will allow the amendment to be passed without further opposition.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, like the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], I am in sympathy with the plans of the Senator from Alabama, but I regret that I can not assent to the purpose he has in view.

It is necessary, perhaps, for me to state briefly the situation as respects the amendment. The senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] offered an amendment some weeks ago proposing this appropriation, and in substance the amendment now proposed by the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS]. That amendment was referred, under the rules of the Senate, to the Committee on Commerce, which has charge, and exclusive charge, of rivers and harbors. The amendment of the senior Senator from Alabama I will read:

For the deepening and widening of the canal leading through the bay of Mobile, from the wharves at Mobile to the lower bay, to provide a harbor of refuge for ships in time of war, $200,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was sent from the Committee on Commerce to the Committee on Appropriations with an unfavorable report asking that the amendment be rejected. Yesterday the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] introduced the following amendment:

To provide for the coaling of ships of war and their tenders, barges, and other vessels at the wharves and elevators at the city of Mobile, and for victualing and watering of ships of war at said wharves, $200,000, to be expended, under the direction of the Secretary of War, in deepening and widening of the channel leading into Mobile Bay from the Gulf of Mexico and up to the wharves at Mobile, Ala.

The Senator from Alabama yesterday placed this amendment upon the ground that it was necessary for the national defense. It not having been reported from any standing committee, it not having been estimated for by any Department of the Government, I made the point of order then upon the amendment that it was a river and harbor project, and under the rules of the Senate these projects are placed under the control of that committee and are excluded from the sundry civil bill. I am told this morning that the Committee on Commerce have considered this amendment. I do not know whether they have reported it or not.

Mr. BERRY. It has been reported and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON. It has been reported and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. So if this matter is a matter connected with the national defense it has gone now by the order of the Senate to the proper and appropriate committee having that subject in charge.

The rules of the Senate, are reasonable rules, not only for the convenience of the Senate, but for the procuration of adequate information respecting the subjects which are brought before the Senate. We are told now, and I am notified as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that if this amendment is allowed to go into the bill it will be followed by numerous similar amendments, all placed upon the ground that they are justifiable and necessary for the national defense. Therefore the Senator from Alabama now opens a new field of investigation, wherein it will be necessary for the Senate, without the intervention of a committee, to decide as between all the harbors and all the rivers and all the lakes of our country, with a seacoast of 6,000 miles in extent, as to which of those harbors, which of those rivers, and which of those lakes are necessary to be improved for the purpose of national defense.

Mr. President, the reason of the rule is clear and adequate to exclude this amendment from this appropriation bill. I repeat what I said last night at the close of the session, that if any of these things are necessary to be done for the national defense there is not a Senator on this floor, or a member elsewhere, who will for a moment hesitate to grant all that may be necessary to promote that national defense.

Mr. PETTUS. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to read what the Secretary of War says?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. PETTUS. I have a communication from him which reads:

War Department, Washington, April 7, 1898.

This is the amendment which I hold in my hand:

I recommend that this amendment be adopted with the qualification at the end thereof.

I will now read what is to be added:

In such manner as the Secretary of War may deem best under the present exigency.

The meaning of that, Mr. President, as I understood from the wording, and also from the Secretary of War himself, was that the money was to be expended in such place as the Secretary of War may deem best on the line of that work.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not care to enter into a discussion of the opinion of the Secretary of War upon this subject. I took occasion to telegraph him regarding it last evening, and received a reply which I shall not now read to the Senate——

Mr. BERRY. Why not have it read?

Mr. ALLISON. But which is in conflict, I will say, with the views of the Senator from Alabama and with the indorsement upon the amendment which the Senator has read.

Mr. BERRY. I think the Senator from Iowa ought to have it read to the Senate. It was read in committee, and there is nothing about it which is going to materially affect the situation. I should like the Senate to hear it. It is, in substance, however, that the Secretary of War does not recommend the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall read it when I get the floor after the Senator from Iowa has concluded.

Mr. ALLISON. But if the Secretary of War does recommend the amendment, that does not make it in order in any sense, because if that were so, then all that would be necessary in order to secure the adoption of an amendment upon this appropriation bill would be for the Secretary of War to say that this or that improvement ought to be made under such limitations and conditions as to the Secretary of War might seem wise and proper. So by putting this amendment upon this bill we open up the entire field of river and harbor appropriations. Therefore, whilst I sympathize with the Senators from Alabama in their desire for the adoption of the amendment, I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations unanimously to make the point of order against it, it not being an amendment which comes here under the rules of the Senate with the consent of a standing committee of the Senate, and it not having been referred, as it should have been, to a standing committee and reported favorably to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, there are two ways under our rules of getting an amendment before the Senate and making it in order. One is by the recommendation of a standing committee and the other is by the recommendation of the head of a Department. The head of a Department, looking at this precise amendment, indorses his recommendation on the back of it with a single qualification, which, of course, we are willing to accept by way of amendment. So if that does not bring it in order, it is impossible to get anything in order before the Senate which does not meet the consent of the Committee on Appropriations, which have not anything to do with recommending amendments.

I wish to make a point right there, Mr. President. The Committee on Appropriations is a committee for the expenditure of money, limited to such expenditure by the laws as they exist. This committee continually puts on new propositions which are not provided for by the laws as they exist, and it has no right to do it. It is not one of the powers of that committee to make a recommendation for an appropriation. It is one of the regular standing legislative committees of this body that has that right, and not the Appropriations Committee. Still they violate that rule continually and with impunity. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] quotes that committee as being opposed to this amendment, and supposes, or leaves the inference very clear, that unless the Committee on Appropriations shall also recommend an amendment it is not in order before this body.

Now, I wish to say to the honorable chairman of that committee—for whom I have the most intense respect, and whose administration of that high office I have looked upon with admiration for many years—that he had better look out when he and his committee, which undertake to monopolize all the powers of this Senate, go to the point of insisting that their recommendations are of value and that nobody's else is; they had better look out, or the Senate will dissolve them and distribute the appropriation bills among the different committees of this body; and I shall be one of the men who will help to do it.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator wholly misapprehends what I stated, or what I intended to state, if he assumes that the Committee on Appropriations expects to make a point of order upon every amendment which does not meet its own approval. On the contrary, when, under our rules, a standing committee of this body recommends an appropriation and has it referred under the rules for a single day to the Committee on Appropriations, it is in order.

As for the implied threat made by the Senator from Alabama, if I know myself I do not crave the work which is made necessary under the rules of the Senate for the Committee on Appropriations to perform. We do conscientiously, I believe, and as best we may, the things that are committed to us under the rules of the Senate; and if the Senator wants to dissolve the Committee on Appropriations, or if the Senate itself desires to do so, I shall not complain if it is done without delay.

Mr. MORGAN. Those instances, Mr. President, in our history, and in the history of all governments, which lead to the dissolution of committees and the distribution of their powers are instances where such committees have assumed to the function of managing the entire legislation in a senate or in whatever body it may be; and there is too much of that in this Committee on Appropriations. That subject has been up before, and has been discussed. I am not on new ground here at all.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me just one moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator why he does not use his epithets against the Committee on Commerce, which is a large committee, and deals with these subjects, and which turned his amendment down?

Mr. MORGAN. Because the Committee on Commerce says, and very properly says, that it has not anything to do with war measures, but the Committee on Appropriations concludes that it has something to do with war measures and nullifies the recommendation made by the Secretary of War by stating that that committee, as twice expressed by the Senator, has unanimously agreed that they would not favorably report this amendment, but would report against it. That is why I say so.

The Committee on Commerce did very proper in saying they would refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs. That is the proper committee for it to have gone to, though at the moment of time when I asked the reference I supposed that the Committee on Commerce was the proper committee. They took the correct view of it.

But the question here is between the Secretary of War and the Committee on Appropriations, which has no right to recommend any new measure upon an appropriation bill. Their duty, sir, they have neglected and forgotten until they think they can run over the laws of this land, which compel them to confine their action and their recommendation to the law as it is written and not to the law as they want to make it.

Here in this bill, as my colleague informs the Senate, there is an appropriation of $1,400,000 for a high-land canal. I do not know how it got into the bill. I have heard of no committee making a recommendation of that sort, nor the Secretary of War, nor anybody else; but there it is.

It has also been intimated here that my colleague and myself are actuated by a personal desire in regard to this appropriation. Well, sir, to the extent that I want to see the Government of the United States succeed in the great controversy which seems to lie before us, it is a personal desire, but it is not a personal desire connected with the prosperity of Alabama. If any other State on the Gulf coast had access to coal mines such as we have through the Bay of Mobile and the Alabama River and through the great trunk lines, one on the east and the other on the west of that river, running near the heart of our coal fields, from which they can bring, on a line of transportation not exceeding 100 miles at the farthest, as good steaming coal as there is in the United States in unlimited quantities down to tidewater, down to the Gulf, at a cost less than any other people in the United States possibly can afford coal to the war steamers on that Gulf—if any other State could do that, I should be here advocating an exactly similar amendment in favor of a bay that happened to lie in Florida or anywhere else. I only regret that the attitude of my colleague and myself—the imputed attitude assigned to us by the Senator from Iowa—is such that we have not apparently a perfectly impartial position toward this question.

Sir, let me suggest whether it is safer to take the coal which is absolutely essential to supply the fleet at Key West or at Dry Tortugas down by the sea voyage below the point of Florida, where, if the enemy has any ships at all upon the sea, they would come necessarily with a fleet to intercept our coalers, or, if not with a fleet, there would come privateers, armed ships, to intercept and capture our coalers, or whether it is better to assist the interior railroad lines of this country in hauling coal six or seven or eight hundred miles and pay them for it, than it is to get it within a hundred miles of the coast? I should like to hear about that.

If we are going into war, Mr. President, we need all our resources of men, material, and money, and it becomes us to economize those resources. Already we hear of a great coal combination in the United States. God grant that there may be no foundation for that story; yet I do not hear it denied. I hear it stated now that prominent financial men in the United States are cornering coal for the purpose of supplying our fleets in the Gulf of Mexico. Ah, sir, what a chance there is for a grab, for a monopoly, for a treasonable spoliation of the people and the Treasury of the United States; and when I and my colleague get up here and propose something that will furnish out of those great mines of Birmingham, in Alabama, a supply of coal that will break up any such foul combination as that, everybody is on the qui vive, and the whole Committee on Appropriations is ready to strike it down.

Mr. President, I am speaking rather boldly, but I feel that it is my duty to speak so, and I am not afraid to do so when I feel that it is my duty. The situation must be looked at, and I appeal to the American people whether, under these circumstances, a little technical quibble like this, where the Committee on Appropriations is trying to overrule a recommendation of the Secretary of War, is to be heard for one second. No, sir.

I do not know whether war is coming or not. No Senator on this floor can rise and point to me and say that I have ever done anything to promote war except to state upon testimony sworn to in the Committee on Foreign Relations, depositions taken, that a state of affairs is going on and approaching which now involves the country in the necessity of striking in defense of its honor, in defense of its name, in defense of humanity, and in defense of its seamen enshrouded in the mud of Havana Harbor. This is all I have done. Those men have brought this war on who have refused to believe the truth and to act upon it; but, notwithstanding they have done that, I am willing here to vote for the taxation of a people who are not reluctant in matters of this kind to furnish their sons an opportunity to march out under the flag of the United States and prove their loyalty to this Government. I am ready to vote for that, and I am ready to vote for a declaration which will make it a necessity that they shall assume those obligations, for I believe that just cause exists.

Now, because we come here and open up, with the recommendation of the Secretary of War, a necessary means of supplying the Navy of the United States with coal, with provisions, with water, and with a place of refuge, if any of our ships should be crippled, with a hospital retreat for their wounded seamen, and furnish also a place of retreat and refuge for merchantmen who may be driven in by stress of war to seek shelter, or who may have received some harm at the hands of belligerent Spaniards—because I do that, this thing is chased around from committee to committee, and it is called an internal-improvement bill, a river and harbor bill, and no committee can be got to touch it. Sir, if a railroad company had brought it into this Senate, I dare say it would have passed before this. I am doing what I can to succor the Navy of the United States before it gets into distress.

More than that, I am doing what I can to make it impossible that this great coal monopoly shall in the beginning of our troubles absorb from the Treasury ill-gotten wealth. That is why so much care is taken here, I suppose, to prevent Birmingham from furnishing coal for the ships at Key West.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I think there would be very little difference of opinion in the Senate, at least no serious difference among us in this matter, if the exact situation was understood. I would like the attention of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] especially. Suppose the entrance to Mobile Bay should be deepened to 25 or 30 feet, or say to 25 or 22 feet, it can then be entered by very large ships.

Mr. MORGAN. By any ships.

Mr. HAWLEY. It can be entered by any ships. Have we, then, sufficient of the modern type of first-class guns to defend that entrance?

Mr. MORGAN. I think we have, Mr. President, but I am not an expert on that subject. I think General Alger, who must know about it, would scarcely recommend the appropriation if he was afraid on that point, but, in order to guard against it, the Senator will notice the qualification that General Alger puts at the end of the recommendation—subject to his discretion as to the place of expenditure. He may not want to deepen that place—I do not know that he does, for I have had nothing to say to him about that—but he may want to deepen the inside channel so as to get up to Mobile.

Mr. HAWLEY. And leave the bar.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, he may want to leave that, but it is entirely within his military discretion. The amendment leaves it right there.

Mr. PETTUS. If the Senator will allow me, I understand that the Secretary of War proposes to reserve the power to himself, by this recommendation, to say that the money proposed to be appropriated shall be expended to the best advantage of the United States Navy and Army. The expenditure is to be made on that line, but as he directs. Whether the outer bar will be entirely opened or not will be in his discretion.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the outer bar were not opened, would the proposed improvement then answer the purpose the Senator seeks?

Mr. PETTUS. It might answer a large part of the purpose by allowing a certain class of our war vessels to go up to the wharves, and by keeping out other classes.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will make no further reply, as I observe the Senator in charge of the bill desires to speak.

Mr. ALLISON. No; I only wish to interrupt the Senator for a moment. As the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] has raised the question, and as the Senator from Alabama nearest me [Mr. MORGAN] has taken occasion to criticise somewhat severely, perhaps not unjustly, the Committee on Appropriations, and inasmuch as on yesterday I spoke kindly of this appropriation and only desired to know the facts in relation to it, not knowing or thinking for the moment that the Committee on Commerce had rejected it, I took occasion last evening to send a telegram to the Secretary of War, in order that I might myself have some information upon this subject.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not understand that the Committee on Commerce have rejected the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. They refused to report it favorably to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORGAN. They asked that it be referred to the Military Committee.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the amendment of the Senator's colleague.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the amendment of my colleague, and it is the only one before the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that my telegram to the Secretary of War, which did not reach him until this morning, his answer to me, and also a further statement explaining his recommendation upon the face of the amendment, shall be read to the Senate, so as to get all the facts we can.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

APRIL 7, 1898.

Hon. RUSSELL A. ALGER, Secretary of War:

Senator PETTUS last night offered an amendment to the sundry civil bill for the dredging of the channel at Mobile, Ala., and puts his amendment upon the ground that it is necessary for the national defense. Will you kindly make such examination as you can during the morning, and send me a telegram on this point as early as practicable to-day, giving the opinion of the War Department upon the subject?

W. B. ALLISON.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 7, 1898.

Hon. WM. B. ALLISON:

In reply to your telegram of this date, I believe the channel of Mobile Bay should be deepened as soon as this crisis is past, but it seems to me it would be better not to open any further deep water ports that would admit war ships until the present condition of affairs is determined. It would make one more place to guard.

R. A. ALGER, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 7, 1898.

Hon. W. B. ALLISON:

I telegraphed you this a. m. concerning Mobile Bay. Senator PETTUS called this a. m. to ask an appropriation of $200,000 for opening that channel. That I readily did, because I know it should be done; but you will notice on the indorsement it is to be left to the discretion of the Secretary of War. I explained to the Senator that I would not favor doing anything to give the enemy another seaport to enter and destroy a town during this emergency; but we could do much work, leaving a sufficient length of the bar to protect us until we saw it was safe to open.

R. A. ALGER, Secretary of War.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair feels that he can not fully sustain the point of order made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and thus exclude the amendment from consideration by the Senate. The rule which is invoked is that such amendments as this can not be entertained unless proposed "in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments" or moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate. It is true the latter was not obtained—the direction of the Committee on Commerce or of the Committee on Military Affairs, to which committees this amendment has been submitted; but the Secretary of War has possibly—I say possibly—brought the amendment within the rule. While perhaps technically the amendment is not proposed in pursuance of an "estimate" made by the Secretary of War, yet it is in precisely the language in which it was originally offered by the Senator from Alabama, and upon which this morning there is an indorsement from the head of the War Department that he recommends that this amendment be adopted with a suggestion as to the method of expenditure.

The Chair does not under these circumstances feel that he should exclude the amendment and declare it out of order. While the point of order is sustained by the Chair, there are sufficient facts stated by the Senator from Iowa to make it a proper case to be submitted to the judgment of the Senate to decide whether it is or is not in order, and whether the amendment itself should be submitted to the Senate. This course will practically submit to the Senate the entire question both of order and incidentally whether, in its judgment, the amendment should or should not be adopted.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, might I inquire whether there is any estimate as to the cost of this proposed improvement?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no "estimate," so far as the Chair knows, of the precise cost of the improvement further than the fact that on the amendment itself is the indorsement, to which the Chair has referred, by the Secretary of War that "I recommend that this amendment be adopted" with a certain qualification. If that is not an estimate as to the cost, it is so near to it that the Chair feels he ought not to exclude the amendment on that account, for it could not have been thus recommended without practically an estimate of cost.

The Chair does not, however, want to be understood that a recommendation of a head of Department, placed upon the face of an amendment as this is, makes such an amendment in order, under our rules.

Mr. WHITE. As I understand the telegram just read from the Secretary of War, it is to the effect that if there is any difficulty with reference to our coast defenses it consists in the proposition that we have too much harbor now. It appears that the opening of this harbor would be an element of weakness, because no method thus far suggested by the Secretary of War or anyone else will exclude the Spanish ship while it admits the American ship.

One of the difficulties which confronts us in the situation into which we are anxious to madly rush, is that our harbors are not properly fortified. Perhaps it might be well (though this suggestion I have no doubt will not be acted upon) to fortify and defend what we have now on hand rather than to create new points of attack and make it necessary to invent some method of defending points which, under prevailing circumstances, are not immediately defensible.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, the Senator from California has omitted to notice that the Secretary of War thinks it advisable that the particular sum of money named in the amendment should be appropriated, to be expended on that line as he thinks best; that the outer bar ought not to be entirely opened, but could be advantageously worked for the benefit of the War Department or the Navy; that there are other portions of the line the amendment provides for that would not concern the outer bar at all; and that this money could advantageously be used for war purposes without entirely opening the bar, which is the thing he objects to. But the Secretary of War desires to open it in part, and you can very readily see that he might have the most important purposes in view in opening it so as to plant submarine mines in the proper place. So the Senator's argument is not based on the facts.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope my colleague will amend his amendment so as to make it comport with the recommendation of the Secretary of War.

Mr. PETTUS. Undoubtedly; that was the purpose. I ask leave to modify the amendment so as to adopt the language of the Secretary of War, by striking out the comma at the end and adding the words suggested.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is proposed to amend the amendment by adding the words:

In such manner as the Secretary of War may deem best under the present exigency.

Is there any objection to it? The Chair hears none, and the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is so modified.

Mr. BACON. Now, I ask that the amendment may be read as it has been amended.

The SECRETARY. The amendment as amended reads as follows:

To provide for the coaling of ships of war and their tenders, barges, and other vessels at the wharves and elevators at the city of Mobile, and for victualing and watering of ships of war at said wharves, $200,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in deepening and widening of the channel leading into Mobile Bay from the Gulf of Mexico and up to the wharves at Mobile, Ala., in such manner as the Secretary of War may deem best under the present exigency.

Mr. WHITE. I think that the Mobile Harbor presents a case where public improvement ought to be made; and if it can be accomplished, in view of the present exigency, I do not know that there ought to be any serious objection, as the end proposed may justify the means. But the amendment now before the Senate has in it certain phraseology that may be misinterpreted elsewhere. It would look as though we were passing an amendment which might warrant the purchase of coffee, tea, sugar, pork and beans, and anything else as the result of the action of Congress, because we are going there for the purpose of victualing the ships. I suggest that the phraseology in that regard might be changed without in any manner interfering with the object of the appropriation, which, I have no doubt, is disconnected entirely with that commercial and corner-grocery feature.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] as modified be submitted to the Senate as in order?

Mr. PETTUS. I ask for a division.

Mr. CHANDLER. What is the question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the amendment be submitted to the Senate as in order?

Mr. BERRY. Is the question as to whether the amendment is in order? Is that the question to be submitted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Yes, sir; that is the question.

Mr. GRAY. I beg pardon; it may be my own fault that I misunderstood the exact question put before the Senate. Will the Chair be kind enough to restate it?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the amendment in order? Shall it be submitted to the Senate?

Mr. BERRY. Is the amendment in order?

Mr. MORGAN. I understood the Chair to rule that the amendment was in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair said that the question whether the amendment was in order or not would be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not understand it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. And the question is whether the amendment is in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Whether it is in order and whether it shall be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE. On what are the yeas and nays demanded?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. On the question submitted by the Chair to the Senate.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. I do not see him in his seat, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH].

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. I do not see him present, and I shall have to withhold my vote.

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL]. I do not know how he would vote, and I therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote under the circumstances, I should vote "yea."

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will be allowed to vote. Certainly pairs are not generally observed on questions of order.

Mr. SPOONER. I vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON], but I do not think this is a political question, and I believe it is always in order for a Senator to vote on any proposition. I vote "yea."

Mr. WHITE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. SHOUP]. He is not present. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I announce my pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD]. I do not know how he would vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to inquire whether the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana has not voted.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I withhold my vote.

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the negative). I inquire whether the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. BACON. I withdraw my vote, being paired with that Senator.

Mr. SPOONER (after having voted in the affirmative). In view of the fact that pairs are being observed upon this question, I feel constrained to withdraw my vote.

Mr. CHILTON. I desire to announce my pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS].

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Allen,	Heitfeld,	Mantle,	Turley,
Bate,	Kenney,	Morgan,	Turner,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate decides that the amendment is not in order and shall not be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. A day or two ago I introduced an amendment intended to be proposed to the pending bill, and asked that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I am instructed by the committee to report the amendment favorably.

Mr. CARTER. By direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, I submit an amendment to the pending bill.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 25, page 94, it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That it shall not be necessary for disbursing officers or heads of Departments to present to the Auditor, along with accounts for any telegraphic services rendered the United States, official telegrams or copies of the same, and that a certificate of the proper officer to the facts necessary to enable the accounting officers to audit the account shall be made, and will be accepted as sufficient evidence of the facts stated in it.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to state that the Committee on Appropriations considered this amendment and thought it unwise to adopt it; but I suppose there is no special point in that.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I fully realize that the Committee on Appropriations considered this amendment, the amendment having been presented for the consideration of that committee by the Secretary of War. Subsequently the proposed amendment was presented to the Committee on Military Affairs and by that committee reported favorably for presentation in the Senate.

The facts in the case and the proposition presented by the amendment, briefly stated, are as follows: Under an existing law, or a ruling of the Auditor for the War Department having the force of law, it is held that every telegram sent by the War Department for which the Government is held liable must be copied and a copy of the telegram, with a translation of it, if it happens to be in cipher, must be filed with the Auditor of the Treasury for the War Department before the telegraph account can be approved. The War Department insists, and the Military Affairs Committee thinks with justice and a proper regard for public policy and the proper administration of the law, that exigencies are liable to arise and do arise requiring that confidential telegrams shall be exhibited to the least possible number of persons for examination. It would be, apparently, quite as forcible for the Auditor to say that it would be necessary for him to detail a clerk from his Department to examine the work performed by day laborers in the public parks or to ascertain that goods had been delivered to the War Department for which payment was requested as to demand that a copy of each and every telegram sent by the War Department, be it confidential or otherwise, should first be translated and submitted to another Department of the Government before payment can possibly be made to the telegraph company for the transmission of the message.

It would be quite as philosophical and logical, I assume, that before the stamp account for the transmission of mail to foreign countries could be allowed by the Auditor the character of the communications sent abroad by the War Department should first be submitted to the Auditor of the Treasury for examination. Bills of the War Department and all the Departments are generally paid and allowed by the Auditor upon proper vouchers presented, with the certificate of the head of the Department attached that the service was rendered for the public interest or in the prosecution of the public business. The following is the certificate which the Secretary of War would sign in a given case and send to the Auditor with a bunch of telegrams:

I hereby certify that the telegrams charged in the above account were on official business; that in the interest of the public service it is impracticable to furnish herewith the original telegrams or copies thereof; that they have been examined in connection with said account, and that said account is correct as to the number of words, computation of rates, distance, etc., and that they contain no direction as to bond-aided or subsidized lines.

Another feature of this matter to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate is this: It must be borne in mind that under the rule of the Auditor's Office complained of, and the rule we seek here to set aside, it is an existing necessity, a duty devolved upon the War Department which can not be ignored, that each and every telegram must be copied and a copy of the telegram forwarded with the account for telegraph service from the War Department to the Auditor's Office; and the copying of the telegrams costs about as much as the sending of the telegrams over the wires.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Montana permit a question?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does not the same rule apply to the Navy Department, to the Interior Department, and to every other branch of the public service?

Mr. CARTER. If such a rule applies to the State Department or the Navy Department, it should be abrogated without any delay whatever.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has not that rule been in force ever since the foundation of the Government in every branch of the public service——

Mr. CARTER. That may be true.

Mr. COCKRELL. In every Department, the State Department and all others, and we have gone through the war of 1812, the Mexican war, the war of the rebellion, and all other wars with that law upon our books and with the accounts audited in that way.

Mr. CARTER. In the war of 1812 we had no telegraph accounts and the auditing department never required copies of letters to be forwarded and filed in the Treasury Department relating to the Navy, the State Department, or the War Department. During the Mexican war telegraph instruments were not used. During the war of the rebellion the Government largely owned or controlled the telegraph lines of the country as military telegraph lines.

At the present time all the telegraphing is done by private corporations, with very slight exceptions, and the telegraph correspondence has assumed proportions which were not comprehended or foreseen twenty-five years ago. The telegraph rates charged the Government are very low, and the correspondence of the Government in its various Departments through the agency of the telegraph lines has increased enormously within the past few years. The rule which applied in 1812 applied only to written communications inclosed in envelopes and sent through the mails. The rule applied in 1846 during the Mexican war does not apply now, because the telegraph lines were not used then. The rule which applied during the war of the rebellion has no application here, because the telegraph lines were then generally the property of the Government or impressed into the service for military purposes.

But at the present time, in case of any war exigency arising, the telegraph would be used more extensively perchance than the mail, and yet we have a rule which was applicable when no telegraph lines existed, it is suggested by the Senator from Missouri, which would require the apparently silly proceeding of the Government discrediting the certificate of the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, and requiring that each and every telegram sent by either Department should be submitted to whom? Should be submitted to the scrutiny of a fifteen or eighteen hundred dollar clerk in the Auditor's Office.

Mr. President, many of the communications which would be sent over the telegraph lines in cipher and otherwise should we have the misfortune to become engaged in war would be of a confidential character. It would be of the most supreme public importance that the nature and contents of the telegrams should not become known. And yet under the rule of the Auditor's Office every telegram of the War Department would of necessity be copied and transmitted to an auditor and subjected to the inspection of his clerks for the purpose of ascertaining what? Whether or not it related to the public business. That is all that could be inquired into; and upon that point let me suggest that any individual fit for one moment to occupy the position of Secretary of War should be relied upon to give a faithful and true certificate as to the public character of the messages sent over the wires at the cost of the United States.

If we can not trust the Secretary of War upon a matter of this kind, what particular faith can you place in the $1,800 clerk who is to inspect the telegrams and determine whether the Secretary of War issued a true or a fraudulent certificate with reference to the nature of the telegrams?

Mr. President, I think the amendment unquestionably should be adopted; and if it is necessary as to telegrams and cablegrams of the State Department and the Navy Department, the amendment should be made generally applicable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I offer an amendment, to be inserted in line 11, page 61.

The amendment was read and agreed to, as follows:

And of which sum $1,000 per annum shall be paid to the collector of customs at Port Townsend.

Mr. GRAY. I offer an amendment, to come in on page 98.

The SECRETARY. On page 98, after line 16, it is proposed to insert:

For continuing construction of the harbor of Wilmington, Del., $100,000; and the provision in the river and harbor appropriation act of June 3, 1898, authorizing contracts to be made for improving the harbor of Wilmington, Del., is hereby amended to read as follows:

"And provided further, That contracts may be entered into by the Secretary of War for such materials and work as may be necessary to complete the modified project of improvement submitted in the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers to the Secretary of War, dated September 30, 1897, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $476,625."

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I wish to say a word, to which I ask the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations particularly and of the Senate, in regard to the amendment just offered by me.

In June, 1896, in the river and harbor act passed during the session of Congress of that year, there is the following provision of law:

Improving harbor at Wilmington, and Christiana River, Delaware: Continuing improvement, in accordance with the modified project, $20,000.

Then—

And provided further, That contracts may be entered into by the Secretary of War for such materials and work as may be necessary to complete the project of improvement, not including estimate for flushing basin and extension of jetty, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $225,846.

That provision is found in the river and harbor act passed in June, 1896, and that is the provision of law in regard to the improvement of the harbor at Wilmington and the Christiana, in the State of Delaware. The Congress of the United States by that enactment decided that the improvement should be made. That was the determination made in the only way such a determination can be made by Congress, to wit, by the enactment of a law. Incidental to that provision of law was the authority to enter into a continuing contract, not to exceed $225,000, to be expended from time to time as appropriations should be made in order to carry out that project.

Mr. President, when this provision of law came before the Department of Engineers, after the passage of the bill, some time, I suppose, in the summer or fall of 1896, it was decided that the amount fixed for carrying out that provision of law was too small. That was the result of a commission of engineer officers appointed by the Department, who, after viewing the situation and considering the project, reported to the Department. My colleague has their report. It is incorporated in the report of the Secretary of War, and I ask him to read it.

Mr. KENNEY. The report is made under date of October 3, 1896. They say:

In view of the above—

Referring to the fact that the continuing contract could not be completed within the appropriation made—

In view of the above, the board believes that the execution of the modified project under existing conditions is practically impossible within the limits of expenditure established by the act. The board, therefore, does not recommend that a continuous contract to complete this project of improvement be made at the present time.

On page 1259 of the Annual Report of the War Department for the year ending June 30, 1897, an estimate is made for the entire work:

Construction of jetty on south side of mouth	$30,000
Construction of jetty at the mouth of the Brandywine	20,000
Dredging 1,429,000 cubic yards (place measurement), as estimated by General Smith, at 18 cents	257,220
Estimated annual deposit in two years, during progress of work, 200,000 cubic yards, at 18 cents	36,000
Total	343,220
Contingencies	34,322

Mr. GRAY. That is recommended and estimated for by the Department.

I conceive that the amendment offered by me is in order on two grounds. In the first place, it is an amendment in pursuance of existing law. In other words, it is not excluded by the language of Rule XVI, which says that no amendment shall be received "unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law." The existing law in this case I have already pointed out to the Senate, which is a determination by an enactment of Congress, which is a law, that that harbor shall be made, that work undertaken, and the authority for a continuing contract given to the War Department, the only difficulty about it being that the engineers in executing the law found that it was not expedient to make a continuing contract for the amount provided for.

In this amendment I follow the recommendation of the Secretary of War and the estimate made by him, and quoting the language of the law passed in 1896, except in adopting the estimate made by him of $377,000 instead of $225,000. So on both grounds the amendment is in substance an attempt to carry out the provisions of existing law. It is also an amendment made pursuant to the estimate of a head of a Department, to wit, the Secretary of War, who, in his report made last December to the present session of Congress, recommends this revised project and this increased appropriation. I think that under the circumstances it is clearly within the most conservative rules of the Senate in regard to amendments to appropriation bills.

I shall say only a word further. Not wishing to make any fanciful or strained use of the crisis through which we are passing, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that on the Delaware River the most important shipbuilding plants in the United States, certainly on the Eastern coast, are situated. The oldest iron ship building establishment in the United States is situated upon this very harbor of Wilmington, where they are now constructing torpedo boats for the use of the United States and hurrying them to completion with all the energy and skill of the trained mechanics who are now there performing their duty. It is exceedingly important that whatever obstruction can be removed in that harbor for the ingress and egress of ships of war of the largest tonnage and caliber should be removed. I think that is a moderate and not a strained statement of the situation at this time, which will commend itself as being one of some degree of exigency.

Believing that the amendment I have offered is within the purview of the rules of the Senate, or rather within the exceptions of the prohibition to amendments on both the grounds I have mentioned, I appeal to the Senate and to the chairman of the committee for its favorable consideration.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I appreciate the situation of the improvement at Wilmington Harbor. This is estimated for in the Book of Estimates. The project for this improvement, I think, was changed after the law of 1896 was passed, so that under the new project or plan the amount required is about twice the amount required in the law of 1896.

Mr. GRAY. Not twice the amount, but about one-third more.

Mr. ALLISON. It is $486,000. Now, this is a change of existing law; it is a new statute, and therefore it is not in order upon the bill, as I understand the rules of the Senate. Sympathizing with this improvement as I do and as I did with that of the Senator from Alabama, I am instructed by the committee to make the point that the amendment is new and general legislation, and therefore not in order.

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator from Iowa before he takes his seat what he has to say in regard to its being in accordance with the estimate of the head of a Department?

Mr. ALLISON. It would be perfectly in order, as I conceive, to make the appropriation; but the Senator does not pause there. He proposes to modify a statute. I could not make the point of order against the appropriation if it were left without a change of existing law. The Senator knows more as to the details of this improvement than I do, but I understand that there is a portion of this work that can be done under either plan.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator will pardon me; I did not hear him.

Mr. ALLISON. My understanding is that although here is a new project, it is not such a diversion or change of a project as would exclude the expenditure of a certain portion of the money under the old plan, so that next year, or this year, if the Committees on Commerce shall report to this body and the House, the change of limit can be made without impinging upon the expenditure of a portion, at least, of the appropriation.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator from Iowa thinks that the recommendation of the Secretary of War as to this matter and the estimate he has returned to Congress is sufficient to bring it in that respect within the rule, I will accept that modification of it.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no doubt that it is within the rule, because it is estimated in the Book of Estimates. There is an estimate here for $205,000, there having been appropriated $25,000 in the original bill.

Mr. GRAY. I will ask that my amendment be modified in that way, if it will meet the objection.

Mr. ALLISON. I think there can be no objection, because it comes clearly within the contract provision, excepting that the Senator's amendment proposes to change the law. Within the provisions of the contract there certainly can be no objection to making the appropriation, because it would then stand on all fours with every other appropriation in the bill. There is no other appropriation here which proposes a change in the law. If the Senator brings it within the statute of 1896, I can see no reason why this appropriation should not stand with the others.

Mr. GRAY. I will modify the amendment so as to read:

For continuing the construction of the harbor of Wilmington, Del.

Mr. ALLISON. And Christiana River.

Mr. GRAY. "And Christiana River." What is the amount there?

Mr. ALLISON. Two hundred and five thousand eight hundred and forty-six dollars.

Mr. GRAY. "Two hundred and five thousand eight hundred and forty-six dollars;" and let it stop there. The clause "to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War" I suppose is not necessary.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not necessary.

Mr. SPOONER. It is the law now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. After line 13, on page 86, I move to insert:

For the construction of a pedestal for a statue of Daniel Webster, to be presented to the city of Washington by Mr. Stilson Hutchins, the site for said pedestal and statue to be selected by the Joint Committee on the Library, $4,000.

Mr. ALLISON. That is an amendment that was reported to us favorably from the Committee on the Library. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], who is also a member of the Committee on the Library, made some suggestion respecting it, and the committee did not agree to the amendment and did not agree to report it favorably because we had not the requisite information as to its location. As respects the amendment, I defer to the Senator from Missouri, who is, I believe, a member of the Committee on the Library as well.

Mr. COCKRELL. The statue, I think, should be accepted. The only question was as to the place of location. The committee had the matter up and was not able to satisfy themselves as to the proper place for it. I see no objection to leaving it to the Committee on the Library. That is the proposition, is it not?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The proposition is to leave the location to the Joint Committee on the Library.

Mr. COCKRELL. I see no objection to leaving it with the joint committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Missouri will remember that as the joint resolution was originally introduced, it having been introduced by me, there was a site designated. I thought that was objectionable when it was submitted in that form. This seems to eliminate that feature and leave it open for the committee to decide. I should think that there could be no objection to it in its present form.

Mr. ALLISON. I think there ought to be some limitation as to placing it upon the Capitol grounds.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so, too.

Mr. COCKRELL. A clause excluding the Capitol and Library grounds should be inserted if it is not in the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. That clause is not in the amendment.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It is not in the amendment. I presume the committee would take due cognizance of the expression of opinion against such a location.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to putting in such a clause. I think it ought to be inserted.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the amendment of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not including the Capitol and Congressional Library grounds.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator state where the amendment is to come in?

Mr. MORGAN. I am going to vote for this amendment, but I should like to inquire whether there is any estimate for it?

Mr. ALLISON. The amendment was reported from the Committee on the Library.

Mr. MORGAN. I know that it was reported, but I should like to know if there is any estimate for it. I am going to vote for it anyhow. I wanted to know its status.

Mr. WARREN. Pending the amendment, while the amendment to the amendment is being reduced to writing, I have a slight amendment that I should like to offer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. An amendment is now pending, offered by the Senator from North Dakota. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri to that amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the amendment the following:

But said statue shall not be placed upon the Capitol or Congressional Library grounds.

So that the amendment, if amended, would read:

For the construction of a pedestal for a statue of Daniel Webster, to be presented to the city of Washington by Mr. Stilson Hutchins, the site for said pedestal and statue to be selected by the Joint Committee on the Library, $4,000. But said statue shall not be placed upon the Capitol or Congressional Library grounds.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire whether the term "Capitol or Congressional Library grounds" includes all the space between the west front of the Capitol Grounds and the Library building?

Mr. COCKRELL. It includes all the area in the grounds of the Capitol, around in every direction.

Mr. HOAR. Speaking for one, I hope there will be some good statues of famous Americans put in the space here. I think it is one of the best possible places, and such statues would increase the beauty and attractiveness and ornament of the great space here.

I do not wish to interfere with this amendment, which seems to have the general acceptance of the Senate, but I hope the matter shall come up hereafter. There is a proposition now to get a statue of Professor Longfellow erected. The Chief Justice is the president of the organization for the erection of a statue of Longfellow. I can conceive of no more appropriate use for the great beautiful space here than to have upon it some ornament of that kind. I merely wish to put in this caveat now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FORAKER. I move an amendment on page 105, after line 14.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I hope the Senator from Ohio will permit me to conclude.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have another amendment that I desire to offer, which I do not believe will give rise to any debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 146, after line 9, insert:

For necessary repairs to buildings and grounds, making connection with the city water system, building new fence, and making other urgent improvements for the United States Weather Bureau at Bismarck, N. Dak., $3,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FORAKER. On page 105, after line 14, I move to insert:

Provided, That $8,000 of said sum may be used for the repair and extension of the levee of the Muskingum River at Zanesville, Ohio, in the discretion of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHOUP. I send to the desk an amendment that I offered several days ago, and I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 11, on page 69, insert:

Maps of public-land States: For the publication of maps of public-land States, to be distributed under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, $1,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Idaho to allow that amendment to be passed over until Monday morning.

Mr. SHOUP. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over. The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR GEORGE.

Mr. WALTHALL. Mr. President, pursuant to the notice heretofore given, I submit the resolutions which I send to the desk, and ask that they may be now considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JAMES Z. GEORGE, late a Senator from the State of Mississippi, and extends to his family and to the people of Mississippi sincere condolence in their bereavement.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay fitting tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary transmit to the family of the deceased and to the governor of Mississippi a copy of these resolutions, with the action of the Senate thereon.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect at the conclusion of these ceremonies the Senate do adjourn.

Mr. WALTHALL. Mr. President—

No man the world ever saw was equally great in every quality of intellect and in every walk of action. All men are unequal, and it is truthful, as well as just, to plant the praise where it is true rather than drown all individuality and all character in one foaming chaos of eulogy.

This, and other language like it, from a distinguished Mississippian in a masterly address on the life and character of Henry Clay, whom he ardently admired, made on me, then quite a young man, a profound impression which still endures. When we speak of noted men who have departed, a reasonable observance of the limitations these words suggest seems due alike to them and to the living who may profit by the lessons of their lives. Praise, when indiscriminate, or comment, if inapt, may obscure the characteristics and achievements of a man of mark, and the record of such a man's life ought not to be thus disfigured and defaced.

In the Congressional Directory we find the following modest and necessarily meager sketch of the late Senator GEORGE, prepared with his approval:

JAMES Z. GEORGE, of Carrollton, was born in Monroe County, Ga., October 20, 1826; his father having died in his infancy, he removed, when 8 years of age, with his mother, to Noxubee County, Miss., where he resided two years; he then removed to Carroll County, where he was educated in the common schools then existing; he volunteered as a private in the First Regiment of Mississippi Volunteers in the Mexican war, commanded by Col. Jefferson Davis, and was at the battle of Monterey; on his return he studied law, and was admitted to the bar of Carroll County; he was elected reporter to the high court of errors and appeals in 1854, and reelected in 1860, and prepared and published ten volumes of the reports of the decisions of that court, and afterwards prepared and published a digest of all the decisions of the supreme court and high court of errors and appeals of that State from the admission of the State into the Union to and including the year 1870; he was a member of the convention in Mississippi in 1861 which passed the ordinance of secession, and he voted for and signed that instrument; he was a captain in the Twentieth Regiment of Mississippi Volunteers in the Confederate States army, afterwards a brigadier-general of State troops, and later a colonel of the Fifth Regiment of Mississippi Cavalry in the Confederate States army; was chairman of the Democratic State executive committee in 1875-76; in 1879 was appointed one of the judges of the supreme court of Mississippi and elected chief justice; resigned his seat on the supreme bench in February, 1881, to take his seat in the Senate on the 4th of March of that year, and was reelected in 1886 and again in January, 1892; was a member of the constitutional convention of the State of Mississippi which was held in 1890 and framed the present constitution of the State.

In these few lines are epitomized some of the leading features in the life work of a man who was a prominent figure and important factor through many years of our country's history—most of them eventful years for that section of the Union in which he resided.

Between these lines and without them we must look for the original capacities and their development, the will power and the work, the qualities and principles, the struggles and successes, the conflicts and triumphs which made up and filled out the well-rounded career so modestly recited.

This little sketch tells us he was educated in the common schools of that early day in Mississippi; but it is only by their fruits that we know of the patience and courage, the toils and trials, it cost him to overcome his early disadvantages and acquire that splendid intellectual equipment in after life exhibited in various arenas.

We are told that he was a volunteer in the Mexican war and was at the battle of Monterey, but the private soldier except in aggregation cuts but little figure in the record of the campaigns in which he makes great names for other men. Tradition, often juster than recorded history, assigns to their proper places of credit the nameless heroes of the field, and in the story of this young soldier's service his gallantry and devotion are abundantly attested.

On his return from Mexico he studied law and was admitted to the bar, but in the fact that he soon established himself in practice where there was formidable competition, despite the drawback of his imperfect education and the interruption in his preparation caused by his military service, we see the workings of that element of success which was illustrated in all his undertakings. For such a lawyer as he became to issue ten volumes of reported decisions of the appellate court was of itself no great performance, but when their completeness and the rapidity with which they were prepared and published in the midst of other engagements are considered, it was a remarkable achievement.

From the careful and discriminating examination of which these books give evidence on every page, it would be inferred that their preparation was the author's sole employment, when in fact they were issued amid the exactions of a varied and extensive practice, which took him much from home, and when private interests claimed much of his attention. In these reports, as in the digest of all the Mississippi decisions by which he subsequently lightened the labors of the profession, we see the proofs of that capacity for constant and effective labor with which our late associate was as liberally endowed as any man I ever knew. This digest, though prepared after the close of the war and under the disadvantage incident to four years of interruption in the habits of a student's life, is yet a model of its kind. In thoroughness and orderly arrangement it is unsurpassed, though the work was done while the courts in which the author was an active practitioner were perplexed with a vast variety of novel and difficult questions arising out of the results of the war and when there were many distracting claims upon his attention.

When the movement for separate Southern independence took shape in 1861, my late colleague's situation in life was enviable indeed. He was the leading lawyer in the district where he lived and ranked high at the supreme court bar of the State, then one of the ablest in the Union. He had the confidence of his people, who watched with pride his progress to prominence from obscurity. In one of the worthiest of women he had early found a most congenial helpmate; he had a growing family about him and was happy in all his private relations and home surroundings. But none of these things could stand between such a man, devoted as he was to the interests and institutions of the South, and the discharge of the duty he felt he owed his section.

After voting for the ordinance of secession as a member of the Mississippi convention of 1861 he promptly enlisted in the military service of the South, and, although less fitted by aptitude and taste for such a sphere than for others in which he figured afterwards and before, with characteristic earnestness he took hold of his new duties and in several positions of high responsibility discharged them all with credit. In the fortunes of war, without fault in any quarter, it befell him twice to be captured, and for many months he was confined in Northern prisons. Making the best of his situation, he followed his labor instinct and found congenial employment in instructing a law class formed of his fellows in confinement.

After the establishment of peace the fruits of his law practice enabled him in a few years in large measure to repair his private fortunes, much broken by the war's results. In 1873 he extended his field of effort by changing his residence to the capital of the State, but in 1888 returned to his old home in Carroll County, where he had never surrendered his citizenship.

The year 1875 was, for Mississippi, perhaps the darkest period in the era of reconstruction, and it was in the political campaign of that year that my late colleague rendered a great service to his people as chairman of the State committee appointed by a convention of the "Democratic and Conservative people of Mississippi." The time was critical, the issues vital, and a brief allusion to them will be excused by their manifest pertinence in this connection. The situation has been aptly described as an—

> Upheaval * * * produced by an unselfish devotion of the whole white people to the public weal, by harmony in counsel, by union in action, by a general abandonment of personal aspiration and personal resentments for the public good. This harmonious and unselfish action had been forced by the ever-pressing evils of maladministration and by the instinct of self-preservation.

It is no marvel, then, that the successful and peaceable issue of a movement like this should have won the people's faith for the forceful man whose wise leadership, backed up by strong support, had been so largely instrumental in giving them back their own. In January, 1876, the legislature of the victorious party came to elect a Senator in Congress, and the successful leader of the late campaign, supported by a powerful following, was among others presented for the place. For such a position, at such a time, no man, whatever his services or merits, could stand before Lamar, then the foremost statesman of the South.

In the lower House of Congress he had proven the very genius of conciliation, and it was meet that his State, at the first opportunity, should indorse his effective work for the restoration of good will between the sections. His wisdom, courage, and conservatism were everywhere recognized, and in the recent campaign he had made the strongest and most stirring popular speeches of his life. He was the idol of the hour, and his election implies nothing against his distinguished competitors, who had not the opportunity which he so well employed in the work of pacification, on which just then so much depended for the South.

Mississippi was not slow in recognizing the worth and ability of the strong man who in 1875 had done so much for her redintegration and retrieval. For more than eighteen years before his death official honors flowed in thick and fast upon him, and others in his reach were declined. Appointed in 1879 judge of the supreme court of the State for a nine years' term, his associates conferred on him a rare distinction by choosing him chief justice immediately on his accession to the bench. Within a year thereafter he was elected to the United States Senate for the term beginning March 4, 1881; but before resigning his position as judge, in February, 1881, he had left his impress upon the judicial annals of the State in important opinions marked by his characteristic thoroughness, lucidity, and thought. His reelection to the Senate in 1886 was without opposition, but that in 1892 was after a stubborn contest with a formidable opponent, Hon. Ethelbert Barksdale, an able man, popular and influential, with large experience in public affairs.

By his advocacy of a supposed measure of relief put forth by the Farmers' Alliance and made the leading issue of the campaign, Mr. Barksdale was enabled seriously to contest Senator GEORGE'S claim, which was a very strong one, upon the support of the farmers, with whom he had a close identification and whose interests were known to be the objects of his special concern and attention. An extensive planter himself, there was no phase of the agricultural concerns of the State that did not enlist his active interest. He was the most serviceable promoter of the Agricultural and Mechanical College in Mississippi, an institution in which he took great pride and of which he was an active trustee from its foundation to the day of his death.

Confident that the subtreasury scheme was a delusion, and that if it should prevail it would bring disaster to the interest it was intended to advance, he boldly assailed it in all its aspects and won a signal victory in the outcome.

For several years prior to 1890 the subject of a new constitution had been much discussed in Mississippi, and Senator GEORGE, an earnest supporter of the proposition, was called from his place here to serve as a member of the constitutional convention, which assembled in August of that year. In the difficult work of that body, which had to deal with the delicate subject of suffrage under conditions of peculiar embarrassment, when widely divergent views were current touching questions of both expediency and power, he was the acknowledged leader and the guide, and to him has been accorded the largest measure of credit and responsibility for the results which were accomplished.

The new constitution came under review in this body in the debate upon the Federal election bill of 1890, and several Senators read and commented on the speeches made by some distinguished members of the convention in disparagement of an important clause in the suffrage regulations which Senator GEORGE is understood to have proposed. His defense of the constitution, and notably of the clause specially assailed, will be remembered here as one of the strongest and most learned arguments delivered in that famous debate.

In this presence I need not comment on his regular attendance upon the sessions of the Senate, his attention to the details of routine work, the patient hearing he gave to discussion, and his general efficiency in the discharge of official duty. With all these most of those around me are familiar.

The products of his intellect and industry which fixed his status in this body as a man of acknowledged ability appear in the record of the work done here and attest his usefulness and uncommon powers. The evidence of patient and exhaustive research and precision, severe analysis and discrimination, unflagging diligence and care were all observable in his prepared addresses delivered in the Senate, and in running debate his adversary always found him well armed, skillful, and alert. If he had been content with ordinary success and had not labored so constantly and earnestly, going without relaxation from one task to another and concentrating his powers intensely upon the next one as upon the last one, his physical constitution was so strong and his habits of living so simple that his useful life might have been considerably prolonged.

Judged by his robust appearance when last in this Chamber at the close of the session in 1896, he seemed as little likely as any here to fall a victim to overwork, but it was not long before failing health brought him the admonition that nature revolted against the constant transgression of her laws. In the summer and fall his condition excited serious apprehension among his family and friends, and in January, 1897, when he had come to Washington to resume his duties, it became so critical that after undergoing medical treatment here for several weeks he returned to his devoted wife at home, a confirmed invalid, who could not come to him. Until almost the end of summer he wrestled with his fatal malady with varying results, some better days when hope revived, some worse ones when it seemed to flee—the ebb and flow of waning vitality, so often incident to the mysterious diseases of the heart.

Near the end of July his wife, who through more than half a century of happy married life had been "his inspiration and his help," passed that shadowy portal where so soon he was to follow. Lonely in the midst of family and friends, desolate with loving hearts around him, after the sundering of this tie how could the stricken husband, withered by this blow and wasted by disease, much longer endure the burden of existence? In the hope that possibly he might derive at least some temporary benefit from change of air and scene, his family removed him to Mississippi City, but climate and skill, affection, attention, and prayers were unavailing then; and there, on the afternoon of Saturday, the 14th of August, 1897, upon the Gulf border of the State he had served so well, he peacefully passed away in the hope of the Christian faith. The highest honors were paid his remains at the capital of the State and all along the route as his body was borne to his old home for interment. The immense concourse of people of all classes and conditions and from many quarters of the State who followed his remains to the public cemetery from the Baptist Church at Carrollton, of which he was in life a member, attested the esteem and affection in which he was held by those who had known him longest and knew him best.

My acquaintance with my late colleague began in 1852, when I was admitted to the bar and he was well on his way to professional distinction. Thereafter until his death we were citizens of adjoining counties, and for many years were active practitioners in the same courts, always members of the same political party and generally in agreement touching party policies and public movements in our State. For nearly twenty years our relations were most cordial, and they were so when he died. There were some intermediate interruptions, none leading to permanent estrangement and all adjusted without formal explanation, incident to constant contact between two men who respected each other and themselves, but whose opinions, tastes, and interests (other than political) were not always in accord.

These occasional disturbances of a friendship which for a large part of forty-five years was somewhat close and often confidential are referred to now, when there should be no affectations or false pretenses, because the truth requires it, and they afforded opportunities no less illustrative than others I had of estimating the attributes and characteristics of the remarkable man I would faithfully represent. He was a strong man, full of resources and conscious of his power. He was self-reliant, self-approving, self-asserting, and in self-help he put his chief dependence. He knew his own capacity for work, he had faith in the strong fiber of his mind and body, and he did not undervalue his intellectual grasp and vigor. He was essentially a practical man, and reason in all things was his guide.

He read books for what he could get out of them that could be turned to practical account, and he studied men and things as well as books. He dealt with substance, and shadows neither diverted nor deluded him. In his favorite projects he was impatient of opposition, and if at times he seemed inclined to overbear those who sought to thwart him it was due to the zeal of an earnest man with fixed opinions striving to do something he thought should be accomplished. In conflict he was resolute and uncompromising; he contended obstinately and sometimes pressed his advantages unsparingly, but when defeat was inevitable he recognized it promptly and without brooding or repining was soon engrossed in other work his hand found to do. Independent in thought always, he was sometimes so in action when a man more politic and tactful might have found reason for concert and cooperation.

He was no more forgetful of his friends and their rights than of himself and his, and he constantly sought the advancement of those who allied themselves with his fortunes. He was capable of any high act of self-abnegation if there were cause enough to justify it, but he brooked no postponement of himself any more than of his friends on any strained idea of magnanimity or other affectation. He considered no preferment too good for himself or for them of which they were worthy and for which they were fitted, and he openly claimed what he thought was due to either. He had his own standard of proper conduct between man and man; it was founded on a sound morality, and he lived up to it scrupulously and consistently. He was a plain man, unostentatious, direct, and courageous. He was rugged in his honesty as he was blunt in his address and sturdy in his physical and intellectual stamina.

His manner was sometimes brusque to his detriment, and he never affected the lighter graces and accomplishments which did not belong to his nature. He was hospitable in his home and enjoyed greatly informal social intercourse, but all the mere artificialities of society he rejected and despised. To worthy objects he gave liberally of his substance, but his charities were neither wasteful nor indiscriminate.

As husband, father, friend, and neighbor he was faithful, just, and kind, and in meeting his duties in these relations he but followed his natural inclination.

To say that a man like this was without decided prejudices and exempt from those of other men, and that with strong attachments he did not both entertain and incur some strong resentments, would be to make a glaring contradiction of his character and rob of their emphasis its positive but harmonious component elements.

The arena to which he was best adapted and in which he was most effective was the bar, in my opinion. Whether measured by his successes or by the skill, pertinacity, and power with which he prepared and conducted his causes, great and small, as a practitioner he was unsurpassed. In that capacity his superiority was illustrated more than on the bench. At the bar his enlistment as a champion brought out in all their intensity forces valuable in contention whose repression or restraint was part of his duty as an impartial judge. Whenever a legal question arose in debate here, in which he took part, his familiarity with the subject, his confidence in himself, and his pointed and ready answers to his antagonists illustrated his ability as a legal debater and showed that however he might shine in other spheres the law was his true element and of that science he was well-nigh a master.

If in statesmanship he had a model, it was the late Albert G. Brown, once an honored member of this body, in whose wisdom he had implicit faith and profound admiration for his talents and his public career. In an address upon that great man's life and services something of his own bent was revealed in the following words spoken in commendation of the character and career he was discussing:

> He knew the people; he mingled and associated with them; he was one of them. He knew their thoughts, their wishes, and their aspirations. He also knew their troubles and trials—their hindrances to success in life. He sympathized with them in their joys and their sorrows. He believed they were capable of self-government. He believed they knew their own interest. He had faith that in the long run they would be, must be, right. * * * Having this faith in them, he was accustomed in forming his judgment on public measures to give a large consideration to the opinions of the people.

Even more perhaps than the statesman of whom he spoke, though neither did so always, did his eulogist defer to the opinion of the masses of the people upon questions of direct concern to them, and out of his sympathy for them arose his jealousy of the growing power of corporations and the capitalistic classes, which he never sought to conceal. If any supposed this sentiment sometimes tinged his judgment or tended to misguide him, none ever doubted its sincerity. It was his pride that he sprang from the people and theirs that he rose so high. He attached much value to their sagacity and instinctive sense of right, and they to the confidence he reposed in them. They were grateful for his good offices and he for their approval and support. He made their cause his own, and it was like him to espouse and urge it with all the intensity of his nature.

Proud as he justly was of his name and fame as lawyer, soldier, judge, and Senator, and careful ever to guard them, if his epitaph were limited to a single sentence most accordant with his preference, I am not singular in the belief that "a friend of the people" would be inscribed upon his tomb.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, others will relate the events of the life of our late colleague, Mr. GEORGE, and tell of the public service which raised him to eminence in his own State and to distinction in this body. I can only speak of our personal relations and of my association with him on committee service. I was acquainted with him only to a limited extent before I came to the Senate, but here we met frequently and on friendly terms as members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry during the Fifty-third and Fifty-fourth Congresses. In the former Congress Senator GEORGE was chairman, and I had ample opportunity to observe his careful, painstaking methods, the cheerfulness with which he accepted every duty, and the thoroughness with which his committee work was performed.

Although we came from the extremes in latitude and politics, I found much in Senator GEORGE'S public career to admire—his firm resolution, his constancy and consistency of purpose, and, above all, the patriotism with which I believe his every act was animated. He was an enthusiastic agriculturist, well posted on every subject that concerned his section, of an original turn of mind, taking nothing for granted, but an inquirer after the truth and a student of all measures that came before our committee. As a lawyer, keen and shrewd to point out defects of careless legislation, we naturally relied upon his accurate judgment and regarded him as thoroughly equipped for the work of the committee, as he was for the deliberations on this floor. As a legislator he was careful and conservative in the extreme, respecting and jealously guarding all the limitations imposed by the Constitution.

Able, laborious, learned, practiced in the science of law and legislation, he was certainly a most useful member of this body. And above all, Mr. President, no one can be better entitled to have inscribed in the record of his life, "An honest man."

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I became acquainted with the late Senator GEORGE, of Mississippi, in December, 1887, at the commencement of my latter term of service in this body. The acquaintance grew into that sort of intimacy which is founded upon a similarity of tastes, and upon the mutual concern which we took in the very serious questions of constitutional law and of political rights and franchises that so often become here the subject of our deliberations. We, indeed, usually agreed in opinion upon these topics; but even when we disagreed we yet took pleasure in discussing our differences and in the attempt to find or make some middle term which might lead to their satisfactory adjustment.

I do not think there has ever been a fairer disputant or debater than our late colleague. He always seemed willing to concede a certain degree of reason in the position taken by an opponent, sometimes frankly admitted that he had formerly entertained the same opinion, for the same causes, but when he came to state his own position, finally taken, this was done in such a tone of absolute conviction and supported by such weight and force of argument as to bring to his aid not only the undecided and the indifferent, but even those who had been adversely inclined thereto. His mind was broad, discursive, grasping with rapidity the problem in argument, yet his conclusions were formed with much care and elaborate forethought. He had the capacity for great and continued mental exertion, the faculty of fixing his mind day after day upon a single theme without weariness, and of contemplating the subject so selected from every side and angle, with all its incidents and dependencies.

His great, distinctive, and, so to speak, his peculiar intellectual force was that of analysis. Herein he was rarely gifted. He divided and subdivided the subject-matter in argument with masterly discrimination and discernment. He stripped off the husk of irrelevancies, all manner of masks and disguises, laid these aside and away, and showed in the clearest light and in open view what the proposition in question was, and in the same manner what it was not. Distinctions came to him, apparently, with much facility. They were neither trivial, unfounded, nor farfetched, but closely related and nearly allied to the very heart of the controversy. Thus he would take apart, piece by piece, a proviso, a section, or a whole enactment which he denounced, not only explaining but exposing its unwisdom, its unconstitutionality, its utter worthlessness, and when he had made an end of this destructive process he stopped short.

He was no believer in the modern doctrine so often urged, that the objector to a measure must offer a substitute, that he is under obligation or bound in duty to proffer an amendment, something better or different. Senator GEORGE constantly denied that there was any such duty or obligation. He asserted that the offering of means for a better writ, by those who pleaded in abatement, was a maxim of the courts, of the courts only, and that it had not the slightest application to the province of the lawmaker. When he was questioned in such a case as to what he would do, he had the directness to reply plainly, without other suggestion, "No law is better than this."

He did not think it his province as a Senator to take remedial or curative charge of the lame, maimed, infirm, and impotent bills and overtures too often presented here. He rested and reposed in this negation, the denial of their utility. In his opinion the commendation and credit of a legislative assembly depended quite as much upon what it did not do, upon what it declined to do, as upon what was done. The business of the Senate was not to pass laws and make enactments, but primarily to consider, to deliberate, and, above all, to understand thoroughly the effect, intendment, and consequences of the measure proposed, and often ended there.

His style of diction and delivery was admirably fitted for the exhibition of the remarkable powers of analysis so highly developed in his mental structure. His enunciation was clear, distinct, slow, and deliberate. He used gesture very little. His pose and attitude were those of conscious strength and stability—monumental in their character. His terms and phrases were well chosen; they expressed neither more nor less than the thought intended. He had a wise economy in the use of words. He discarded ornament; he avoided tautology and repetition; the innate beauty and force of pure reason set forth in unadorned simplicity; these sufficed him. Hence, although his speeches in the Senate sometimes attained, when the subject demanded it, a great length, yet the sentences in them are short, without involution or parenthesis. They read one after another like maxims, like elementary truths; statements not made, but born of that necessity which the rigorous logic of the cause required. This is well shown by his argument in the Du Pont case. It is quite long, yet the separate sentences are brief, pithy, and closely fitted to the various branches of the discussion.

One may read them without fatigue, since every period makes a plain and visible progress in the case. In this excellent production, much noted and commended at the time, one of his traits as a jurist is strongly marked and defined—his deference for the text of the organic law, whether it be the constitution of a State or of the United States. For in this case he had often to consider the constitution of the State of Delaware as well as that of the Federal Union. He approaches each with equal deference. He treats both as being in their respective spheres of the same dignity, as clothed with powers exclusive, absolute, and essentially sovereign. This was with him a doctrine which he delighted to honor and which in his long public career he constantly avowed and defended.

During his service in the Senate, he was chosen by the people a member of the convention to frame a new constitution for the State of Mississippi. He accepted the office so conferred upon him, and those of us who were present recollect very well that day when he rose in his place in the Senate and asked for an indefinite leave of absence, which was granted, that he might give himself wholly to the performance of the duties of this new position. Some time before he left Washington on this service he had, after long reflection, and upon great consideration, drafted a proposed clause in the new constitution upon the right of suffrage. This draft he submitted, for inspection and examination, to a few of his Senatorial colleagues, upon the single question of its constitutionality, whether there was anything in its terms in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. Receiving for answer, without dissent, that the clause in question was not in conflict with the Federal Constitution, he carried the draft of it with him upon his journey home, and at the proper time offered it as a section in the new constitution. It was adopted, after full debate, in very nearly the text and terms of the original draft, and is now a part of the organic law of the State.

This suffrage clause became afterwards the subject of criticism and attack in the Senate upon the ground that it was in violation of the Federal Constitution, that it was an ordinance of government not republican in form, and not competent to be made in a free State by and for a free people. The reply of Senator GEORGE to these objections was full and explicit. His argument in support of the suffrage clause of the constitution of his State, both upon the general principles involved and upon a comparison of the same with similar provisions either now or at some time existing in the constitution of other States, was one of the ablest and clearest ever heard here upon any occasion. Objection was silenced. The attack failed and has never since been renewed.

His prolonged and laborious service in the Senate had been largely devoted to questions nearly akin to the suffrage clause. Year after year he had thought and spoken concerning the force bill and other methods then proposed of Federal intervention with the election systems of the Southern States and upon the still broader theme of inter-race relations. Always his utterances had been without threat, without menace, earnest, sincere, but temperate, considerate, devoid of violence. His conduct had been that of the statesman, that of the philanthropist and the philosopher. He purposed good for all, good for both races, white and black, but especially he kept faith with those of his own race and lineage. He was not willing to abandon the claim of his own race to a certain political supremacy. He thought this was an indispensable necessity for the welfare of both races. At last the opportunity came to him, as the author of this special provision on the subject of suffrage, to formulate this policy in the law of his own country.

The most beneficent consequences have resulted from his labors. There is now a stable, firm, unbroken pacification of the government in his State. Civilization and social order have been reestablished. The former disastrous conditions of riot, confusion, and bloodshed have ceased. All classes and colors are at rest. Dissent has been merged into accord and satisfaction. What he wrought in this magnificent domain for human progress and happiness has not died with him. The future generations of that historic Commonwealth will say of him in the years yet to be, Senator GEORGE gave to Mississippi and to all the inhabitants thereof the priceless boon of peace.

One of the finest traits in his rich and varied character was that of political courage. Having once made up his mind as to the course of action to be adopted, he pressed forward against every obstacle. This was strikingly exhibited in the history of this constitutional provision relating to the franchise. No sooner was it declared and published than there arose instantly a formidable and widespread opposition to his views and action. A section of the press, not only at his home, but in the adjoining States of the South, united in their denunciation of the proposed enactment and its author. They accused him of being governed by mere partisan motives and of using the powers of the convention to maintain and perpetuate the supremacy of his own political faith and followers; but Senator GEORGE took no notice of this storm of aspersion and obloquy.

Deeply convinced of the rectitude of his own purpose and of the excellence of the measure which he advocated, he did not hesitate or falter. He was one who could bear unmoved immeasurable burdens of hatred and detraction, rejoiced in bearing these in a cause which commended itself to his conscience and judgment. He cast behind him the strife and rancor, the hindrances and difficulties of the present hour, relying in quiet and in confidence upon the good effect of the enactment in the future as an answer—more than an answer—to the charges made against himself and his associates. He was not regardless of public opinion, but he did not compliment his opponents by yielding one jot or tittle of his own convictions, nor did he swerve one moment from the course which he had chosen.

He had been a member of the convention which passed the ordinance of secession, as he was a member of the convention which framed the latest organic law of his State. Revolutions usually destroy those who take the initiative in them, often when they succeed, always when they fail; but here is an instance of one who witnessed the beginning, the decline, and the final overthrow of a great revolution, who walked afterwards unscathed, with wary step, through the disturbed era of reconstruction, and who closed his career holding the avowed and conceded primacy in that deliberative body which gave supreme law to another and later generation.

It may be, indeed, asked concerning our departed friend, as of others, what did he accomplish in his long service at Washington? Why is not his name connected with some law of general importance, some measure of national repute? The answer to such inquiry is not difficult and is readily apprehended. He spent the whole period of his service here in the minority. It is true he was a Senator during the first Administration of Mr. Cleveland, somewhat akin to his own political faith; but that Administration had been from the beginning incomplete, imperfect. It controlled only one branch of Congress, and comprised only the President and the House of Representatives in its best day. It was, by consequence, meager in results, and wholly barren of initiative legislation.

Senator GEORGE was here during the second Cleveland term, but very early he dissented from the ideas of the President upon the subject of finance, being one of the ablest and most earnest advocates of the free coinage of silver, and adhering steadfastly to that policy. In the whole course of his service here he never stood for a day in line with that majority which has the power to formulate its opinion in the shape of statutes. Occasion did not once touch him at the elbow, saying, "Now I am with you; move toward your purpose." Often history acquaints us with men whose destiny placed them in positions too high for their abilities. Senator GEORGE is not to be numbered with this class. His splendid abilities were marred by that fortune which always allotted to him here a place, a very high place, among the minority.

The man was greater, far greater, than his opportunities. He was one of the statesmen, rare in this time, who depended for his influence and ascendency upon reason and argument. He had no other arts, blandishments, or resources, or, having them, disdained to use them. "If you think with me, vote and act with me; if not, go and do otherwise;" such was his port, carriage, and utterance toward the people at home, as to the Senate here.

Living, he was highly honored; gone from among us, his memory will be fervently cherished as long as intellectual excellence, purity, and singleness of heart are reverenced among mankind.

In bidding farewell to our illustrious colleague we seem to be taking leave of a companion who has journeyed with us for many days among the mountain summits of high thought, of lofty action, and of grand design. Somewhere among these almost untrodden heights the ardent hopes of this loyal and stalwart servant of the people, his ambitions and aspirations, his once teeming plans for future betterment, his bright visions of a coming time of improved conditions for the masses of his fellow-men, all these are buried, buried in the irrecoverable past, and no man knoweth the sepulcher.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, it is always interesting and instructive to review the character of a public man—a statesman of our country—whose political and private character received its form and reached its maturity under the strongest operation of moral and Christian influence. The serious thoughts, the elevated reflections, and the earnest devotion to higher principles of life and conduct, thus influenced, conduce to the perfection of a nobler life. It is righteousness that exalteth a nation, and the service of God which perfects a man. Kindness, honesty, and truth are the ripened fruit of such a life which puts away malice, envy, falsehood, and injustice.

Such a character was that of the late Senator JAMES Z. GEORGE, of Mississippi, whom we this day honor and mourn. His mind was deeply imbued with reliance upon and love for religion. A sincere fervor acting upon a clear and strong understanding gave a simplicity, directness, and continuity of thought, and made him lofty in demeanor, dauntless in spirit, and conscientiously devoted to the performance of every duty and to the protection and security of the best interest of that portion of our great country intrusted in part to his watchfulness.

For years our daily contact in this Chamber has made us familiar with the characteristics, the capacity, and worth of this lamented and valued Senator. His frank and earnest nature forbade all barriers to his inner life. Truthful, strong, and brave, he looked calmly and fearlessly upon current events, as he did upon the men who inspired them. He was not without peculiarities, for strong and masterful men rarely are; yet, all in all, you seldom meet his like. He did not belong to that treadmill order of men, content with things as they are, but was aggressive in carrying out his convictions; and, if those convictions differed with his party or his fellow-Senators, he would maintain them with increased force and energy, and the friction it would beget often brought out from him a latent power that, in argument, seemed to have been held as a reserve force for the occasion.

As a lawyer he had few equals. His forte was legal argument, and it excites not envy but pride among that higher class of lawyers in this body to say that the late Senator GEORGE was the equal of any.

Senator GEORGE possessed preeminently a legal intellect, great clearness of thought, accuracy of discrimination, soundness of judgment, and strength in forensic debate. These high qualities, united with a rare knowledge of jurisprudence, a large experience in the intricacies of legal practice, and extraordinary application to business, rounded off and completed the character not only of a great lawyer, but of an exalted statesman.

His judgment was so accurate and practical that he rarely made a mistake in dealing with men either in his public or private capacity. The simplicity of dress and manners of Senator GEORGE was a key to his nature, as it was an indication of his politics and his idea of government. He believed we had too much legislation, and that our laws should be few and simple. His philosophy was that the individual, as a personal and legal entity, was the unit of governmental existence and the prime object of legislation; that the aggregation of men could take care of themselves, as a whole; but the individual man should be protected from being overridden by the mass in its concentrated form and power. In this he was right, for it is this philosophy that leads to local self-government, without which there can be no republic in the true sense of that term.

The services he rendered his State, his section, and his country need only to be hurriedly reviewed to show not only the earnestness of his patriotism, but also the appreciation of his fellow-citizens. When a mere boy, JAMES Z. GEORGE responded to the call of his country and enlisted in the Mississippi Rifles, commanded by Jefferson Davis, and shared the brilliant fortune of that regiment under its famous commander in the campaigns in Mexico of Gen. Zachary Taylor. Senator GEORGE was proud of his boy soldiering, and was wont to refer with pride to the wonderful achievements of that war, of the vast territorial possessions, with its extended ocean coast, it brought under the flag of the United States, together with the gold of California and silver of Nevada. When he died it left but two on the rolls of Congress who fought in the Mexican war. Though he did not need it, he took pride in drawing his pension of $8 a month. He did not, however, use or convert it to his own use, but passed it over every quarter to a trustee, regularly appointed by the courts in his county for that purpose, to give to the poor widow of a soldier of the Mexican war, whom he designated to receive it. This was kept up until his death.

When the sections of our country, each as it construed a common Constitution, called upon the citizens of the respective States to settle by the ultima ratio that which the forum of debate could not solve, this private in the Mexican war took sides with his native South. He was a captain in the Twentieth Regiment of Mississippi Volunteers in the Confederate States army, afterwards a brigadier-general of State troops, and subsequent thereto colonel of the Fifth Regiment of the Mississippi Cavalry in the Confederate States army.

But it was more in civil than military life that his qualities of leadership in guiding and fixing public opinion on great and vital questions were developed. In civil life he found promotion rapid and easy from engrossing clerk in the Mississippi legislature to reporter of the supreme court, to the membership of that exalted tribunal, to the convention which withdrew his State from the Federal Union, to the presiding officer or chief justice of the supreme court of that great State, thence to the Senate of the United States, where, from 1880 to 1897, he performed his high duties with that earnestness, application, zeal, and ability which each of us so well remembers.

That he was firm and positive, unyielding, and not to be deterred from any of the consequences of his convictions is too well known and too highly appreciated in this Chamber to need review. A bold, brave man, sustained by positive convictions and restrained by religious principles, yields not to party, unless its principles and measures accord with his earnest and honest sentiments; then his party can not go too far for him; he follows or he leads along the line of duty, looking neither to the right nor the left, but only looking ahead, where the star of justice stands over the manger of righteousness.

Few men have lived among us who were more practical than Senator GEORGE. He was thrifty and frugal and thoroughly businesslike, and in that line was quite a success. Brought up and educated in a plain, practical way, with farmer boys as his associates, the log schoolhouse his fountain of knowledge, and the old-fashioned pedagogue with frown and rod as master, he had instilled into him the crude and strong ideas of practical life which abided with him even to the end, in his every public station, however exalted. His habits, his manners, his dress, and mode of living, even in official and social circles, while thoroughly substantial, were without affectation or pretension, plain and unostentatious. The religious and moral principles instilled in him in his early life, under the dripping of the sanctuary of his Baptist faith, backed by a strong native mentality and high moral courage, molded his private and public career.

His style of oratory, whether upon the hustings, before the court, or in the Senate, partook of his, if I may so speak, brusque and rather rugged nature. Neither euphony nor rhythm found place in his speeches and writings, but they were none the less wonderfully practical and attractive. They were without embellishment in language or ornament of style; his sentences were severely plain and pointed, and each seemed to have a driving force that sent it home. Beauty and brilliance were lost in the substance of his argument; weakness became strength; facts were analyzed and hewed into line, until the whole was seen to be a logical conclusion. His strength of style greatly consisted in jagged and unpolished points, strongly put together. He took a businesslike view of whatever he had to deal with, and estimated things at their real value and treated them accordingly. He was eminently practical, and took a businesslike view of everyday life.

The sentimental and beautiful did not dominate his nature, nor did imagination lead his judgment astray. With him 2 and 2 made 4, and twice 4 made 8. To him the bloom of the cotton plant was more beautiful than that of the rose; with him the fresh, green, and sweet-scented corn in Yazoo Bottom excelled in beauty and attraction lilies "which toil not, neither do they spin." The forest oak, from which was made his house and fences, had more attraction for him than groves of that most beautiful queen of the South, the magnolia. Indeed, it may be said of Senator GEORGE that he was a diamond in the rough, none of its strength lost by polishing.

He was born in the country, grew up in the country, and was wedded to that mode of life. One of his social delights was to tell of his country home near Carrollton, Miss., where his cattle browsed and his lambs skipped around him. At this home was displayed nature in her simplest and most attractive form, and the contemplation of it filled his mind with aspiration and hope. There he could see the sun rise and set without looking through a window darkened around by brick and mortar. The nights were as clear and beautiful as the Italian skies, and the stars, those eternal sentinels of the infinite, invited communion with the boundless, and thus became the inspiration of the highest reason and noblest purposes.

Thus nature in her finite forms and in her infinite suggestions became his instructor. The boundless expanse around taught him freedom of thought and action which he introduced into the practical affairs of life. He became the interpreter of nature in all its varied expressions of "universal mind," and learned to reflect on the realities of life as they affected him and his fellowmen. But his was no dreamland; the tangible and palpable peopled his world of thought and action.

The ability and characteristics of Senator GEORGE, in private as well as public and official life, impressed his constituency and the country. His boat in his voyage over the sea of life left a wake behind that marks its track and is seen of men.

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And, departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time:

Footprints that perhaps another,
Sailing o'er life's solemn main,
A forlorn and shipwreck'd brother,
Seeing, shall take heart again.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, Senator GEORGE entered the Senate on the 4th of March, 1881. Before entering the Senate he had held important positions both in military and civil life. A private in the United States Army in the Mexican war; captain, colonel, and brigadier-general in the Confederate army; reporter of the court of error and appeals; chief justice of the State, which position he resigned to take his seat in this body. After a service of six years he was reelected in 1886, and again reelected in 1892. The confidence that the people of Mississippi had in his ability and integrity is evidenced by the character of the positions he had held in that State and his repeated election to the Senate.

He at once took high rank in this body as a debater, and until he was compelled to absent himself on account of ill health he took an active part in the proceedings of the Senate.

He was a man of positive convictions on all the questions that came before him on which, in his official capacity, he was called upon to act. He was conservative, painstaking to a laborious degree in his examination of public questions. He carefully considered the reasons and arguments in support of or against a proposition; he did not reach a conclusion in haste, nor did he let his passions or prejudices blind his reason. His investigation was honestly made in search of the truth. His mind informed on the subject, he called into play a well-matured judgment, and formed his conclusions in a dispassionate way—I may say in a judicial way. His opinions once formed, he was ready to defend them with that positiveness of right that belonged to his nature and that is characteristic of a strong mind. He did not consider the question whether it was good or bad policy to proclaim what he believed. He was not a trimmer. Right with him was right, and the consequence of such support did not concern him.

He was self-reliant, but not improperly dogmatic or self-assertive. He felt his strength, and meant others should see as he did, by force of logic and fair argument. While he was positive in his convictions and firm in defense thereof, he was courteous to those who opposed him, but he was not tolerant of pretense or shams. He hated hypocrisy, but respected the opinion of those who honestly differed with him. He could defend the right or attack wrong, as he saw it, with all the power at his command, without offense to his opponent. His earnest conviction and self-reliance made him combative, but not quarrelsome. In debate he gave and received with outspoken frankness, but recognized the proprieties and amenities of the place and what was due to his opponent.

As a youth he had followed his country's flag in a foreign land. In his mature years he believed duty to the State in which he lived demanded that he put himself in hostility to that flag. In his judgment he was no less a patriot in his last service than in his first, and while he accepted to the fullest extent the results of war and all that entailed on him and his people, he could not admit that he or they had been in error in their attempt to secure different results.

As a soldier he was aggressive and brave—he could not be otherwise. He was not a man to do things in a weak or half-hearted way; his heart was in whatever he felt it his duty to do. He was a believer in the people and their capacity for self-government; he believed all power was with them, and as a Senator he regarded himself as the representative of his State and bound to do its will. He was a partisan because he believed the principles of his party would secure to the country good government and the blessing of freedom.

He loved the South with a love begotten of the sacrifice he had made for it, but his patriotism was not bound by sectional lines and he was devoted to the interests of the people of every section, of our common country. A soldier, a jurist, a statesman, and a patriot, his death was a loss not to the people of Mississippi alone, but to the people of all the States.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, the hand of Death has been busy in the Senate during the past year. Thrice in less than six months has he touched with icy finger our membership, and made vacant a place in our midst. Senator GEORGE laid aside the cares, the trials, and suffering of his long, useful, and honorable career on the 14th day of last August, at his home in Mississippi, during the recess of the Senate. It is well, therefore, that at this the first session after his death we should pause for a day amid the exciting scenes that surround us and do honor to his memory.

It is for others to sketch his life and the development of his mind and character as it was exhibited among the people of the State whom he loved so well and who honored him so highly. I shall only speak of him, and that briefly, as I knew him in the Senate, where our acquaintance and friendship began thirteen years ago. Senator GEORGE had already made a distinguished place for himself in this body when I came into it, and I at once recognized in him those forceful qualities of mind and character which impressed me more and more as the years rolled by. Always clear in his grasp of a subject, he was to me a most interesting debater.

The excitement of discussion seemed to clarify his intellectual perceptions, and gave a remarkable force and perspicacity to his carefully uttered propositions. The search for a right and just conclusion was always materially aided by his participation in debate. It was always a pleasure to have him on your side, for then you were sure that the side you espoused would receive the full benefit of his well-supplied intellectual armory, and that there would be no surrender until the last keen weapon had been used.

No review of Senator GEORGE's service in the Senate would be adequate that did not touch at least on the place he occupied among the lawyers of this body.

He was instinctively a legal gladiator. A question involving the principles of the common law or the learning of constitutional jurisprudence had for him irresistible attraction, and the opening gun in a contest on such a question was the signal for him to move to the front.

I never saw the gaudium certaminis so plainly in evidence as in him on such an occasion. He came to the discussion of a legal point with faculties trained and disciplined by a lifetime devoted to the study of his profession. Yet he never trusted to the garnered learning of his well-stored mind—his ability as a legal casuist was always fortified by a laborious research which exhausted the particular question in hand.

When hard driven by his antagonist, he displayed a remarkable capacity for refinement of reasoning and originality of view, and you were never sure that he would not carry the day, or at least escape defeat, by an unexpected tour de force.

It was this trait, this faculty of making the worse appear the better reason, that perhaps deprived him, with some, of the rank of a profound and great lawyer, which his capacity for severe labor and exhausting research, combined with a clearly working and logical intellect, would naturally give him.

Be this as it may, I venture nothing in asserting in the presence of many of the distinguished lawyers of this body who served with Senator GEORGE that no one ever encountered him in legal debate without being made aware that all the legal acumen and ability he himself possessed would be required for the contest. I do not think I ever knew one more skilled in the dialectics of the law than he.

A Senator so equipped and always so ready could be and was of immense service to the country. No specious and plausible proposition, dangerous to our institutions, was likely to escape the keen scrutiny and well-timed challenge of such a lawyer-statesman. None better than he could expose the danger lurking in some well-meant measure founded on a temporary expediency, which sacrificed the integrity of our constitutional system, and no one could more effectively defend our priceless inheritance of liberty regulated by law. In this respect I conceive that the Senate and country have suffered a loss which will be long and sensibly felt.

It is not strange that a man so devoted to his work, so laborious and painstaking in all that he did, did not cultivate as much as others, or perhaps as much as he ought, the social side of his nature. True it was that Senator GEORGE often repelled those who were prepared to admire his abilities by a brusque and blunt manner that did him, I am sure, injustice. There are some men, Mr. President, so innately honest and sincere, who so despise shams and false pretense, that in avoiding them they go unnecessarily to an almost rude extreme, and in this way doubtless Senator GEORGE often offended without being conscious of his offense. I want, however, to bear testimony that I have more than once known him when he came to realize that he had so offended express the pain he felt at the discovery and hasten to make amends.

That he had a warm heart and sympathetic nature, those who knew him best can testify. That he was capable of a steady and sincere friendship I am here to-day as a sorrowing witness. The beadroll of Mississippi's distinguished sons is a long and brilliant one. It is adorned by names that will live as long as the history of the Republic is read. The added name of GEORGE will be viewed with satisfaction and pride by the sons of that gallant State in the years that none of us shall see. Mr. President, he was my friend, and I sincerely mourn his loss.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I regret that the pressure of other duties has prevented me from formal preparation of the expression of my respect and admiration for Senator GEORGE, who has gone from among us. The full and critical appreciation and careful analysis of his character given by loving friends who have spoken here to-day leave me only the position of a gleaner in the field where others have fully gathered.

I think I sat with Senator GEORGE in this Chamber for something over sixteen years. I was never intimately acquainted with him. I think he was perhaps a man not easy to become acquainted with. I knew him more intimately as a member of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, where I found him upon my appointment to that committee some six years, I think, before his death. I learned to know him then as we come to know each other when there is no special intimacy or special acquaintance growing up between us, and I think that we form a pretty good estimate of each other's abilities and characters even where we do not become intimate by close association. Indeed, I think there is no body in the world where the character and standing and ability of men are so accurately measured as in the Senate of the United States.

We differed more frequently than we agreed. It was my fortune to find myself espousing usually the opposite side of the question from Senator GEORGE. We differed in politics, in our interpretation of the Constitution of the United States, in our views as to the wisdom of legislation, and yet, perhaps owing to this very fact, the tribute of praise which I award to him will be none the less acceptable.

We very frequently hear criticisms upon the character of this body, more especially upon the ability of Senators as compared with Senators in the olden times. It is fashionable to lament that there are no longer Websters, or Clays, or Calhouns, or Bentons in the Senate of the United States; and yet, in view of my observation of the late Senator from Mississippi, I am convinced that if he had lived and been a member of the Senate fifty years ago, he would have taken rank, in the estimation of the people, among the most wise and able Senators who have adorned the Senate. A Senator who comes now to this Chamber meets with an average ability with which the Senator of olden times did not have to contend. No man can be preeminently conspicuous here to-day. There is too much of force, of learning, of strength, of ability here for any one man to stand head and shoulders above his associates.

Senator GEORGE, I think, was heard upon every important question which attracted the attention of the country while he was a member of the Senate. Sitting here in my seat to-day and reflecting that he was not considered a talking Senator, I could not but feel surprised when I remembered that there had been no important question discussed in the Senate from the day of his admission into it that did not receive the benefit of his thought, experience, and argument. I doubt whether there is a Senator living to-day who has spoken and spoken ably upon so many topics, upon so many measures, as our late colleague.

He was a lawyer pure and simple, I was about to say; but he was more than a lawyer. He had a very wide range of information and he had opinions upon every topic. But as a lawyer he was most conspicuous and eminent. The term "great lawyers" is so often used that it comes to mean very little, and yet I think I can say, and say truly, that Senator GEORGE was a great lawyer, and that is great praise. I know it is fashionable to sneer at the law and lawyers, but law is the safeguard of civilization; it is the foundation of social order; it is the guaranty and the only guaranty of personal right. When a man becomes skilled in the law, able in the law, there is no higher eminence to be attained in our country or in any country.

I think it may be said that Senator GEORGE possessed genius. He certainly had some of the eccentricities which it is said men of genius possess. These eccentricities were sometimes manifested in his argument of legal principles. He was a dangerous antagonist. He knew all the methods of attack and defense. He could wield with equal skill the broadsword or the rapier. He was fertile, original, and bold as a lawyer. I think I have never known a lawyer who had greater respect for the decisions of the courts than did Senator GEORGE. Even when he thought they were wrong he recognized their binding force, their validity, and respected them.

But when in pressing a legal proposition he found his way hedged up with cases—and he had a most intimate knowledge of all cases and he had them at his instantaneous command—he had a way of trying to blaze a new road, as it were, something like what lawyers would call confession and avoidance; and although he seemed to others to be wrong and to be pursuing a path which could not lead him to the end he desired, he had a force of argument, a directness of purpose, a facility of statement and comparison and analysis which almost convinced those who differed with him that he was right.

An illustration of this comes to my mind. In the measure which was known as the anti-option bill it was provided that the business of dealing in options and futures should be so taxed that it would be destroyed. Senator GEORGE, sympathizing with the purpose of the bill, being, I think, as zealous as any advocate of the measure in the desire that in some way the business could be destroyed, felt that it was unconstitutional to use the power of taxation for the purpose of destruction, and therefore, although his constituency desired that he should support the bill, although he himself entertained a hostility to the business in question as great as that of any other person, he opposed the measure upon the ground of its unconstitutionality, and indeed that it would be ineffectual.

But he thought he had discovered a way in which the purposes sought by the bill might be effected. He thought he saw that dealing in futures and options was an obstruction to commerce as much as a rock in a harbor or a wreck in a channel, and that Congress had the right to remove the obstruction. So he proposed an amendment, the purpose of which was to fine and imprison anyone who should engage in the business of dealing in options and futures. He supported that view, in which I think scarcely any lawyer in the Senate agreed with him, with such force, with such wealth of learning, with such reference to general principles and the decided cases as certainly to excite our admiration, if not to convince us. I think it is an illustration of the bent of his mind.

Senator GEORGE belonged to that school of lawyers who interpret the Constitution of the United States strictly. I think if he were living he would esteem it high praise for me to say that he was a zealous State rights man. I do not think that I have ever seen the doctrine which that school of lawyers hold so ably set forth as in the minority report submitted by Senator GEORGE upon the bill to provide for national inquests.

I may not stop to refer to it at length, but I will say this. He may have been called a follower of John C. Calhoun, but I believe, Mr. President, that Mr. Calhoun never stated the doctrine that the Constitution conferred upon our Government only certain delegated and specific powers with such force, ability, and clearness as it was stated by Senator GEORGE in that report. I believe that had he lived in the days of Calhoun he would have been esteemed certainly as great a Senator and as great a man as was Calhoun.

But I may not dwell longer upon his character. I said that we differed in politics. When he came to the Senate I think that his career in his own State during reconstruction times had created in my mind a prejudice against him. But as I came to know him and understand his character I formed a juster estimate of the man and came to be one of his admirers.

Death teaches us, Mr. President, to form juster estimates of those whom we have known. The living, especially men in public life, are subject to fierce criticism in these days. No man can occupy public station whose motives are not questioned, whose honesty is not suspected, and who is not fiercely and unjustly criticised. We criticise the living; but when they are gone, we view them in a clearer and better light and see that much of our criticism was unmerited. As we look back now upon the life and services of Senator GEORGE we behold a singularly able, striking, and unique figure, a man eminent as a lawyer, eminent as a statesman, a man without show, without ostentation, despising shams and pretense, not selfish, but self-reliant—in every way a notable character. We come to a juster understanding, a more charitable and truer estimate; and so we come greatly to respect and to admire him who has gone.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, this tribute to the memory of the late Senator J. Z. GEORGE, my illustrious predecessor, is the offering of a friendship that has been lifelong, unbroken, and intimate. He once said to me that my family for three generations had given him three of his best and dearest friends.

A near observation of his private and public life enables me to form a just estimate of his great character. I think few men knew him as well and none loved him better than I.

My friendship had in it every quality of esteem, of respect, of admiration, of confidence, and of affection that could make the tie sacred and binding. Its spell is strong upon me; and though I shall live to his ripe age, it shall still blossom in my heart.

When a boy, I first began to know him at his own fireside. His tenderness for his young wife and gentleness and forbearance with his children were evidences of the warm heart within. A young man, he married the woman he loved, and for half a century they walked the path of life, hand in hand, with mutual confidence, trust, and devotion. He loved his children, and all through this life that affection has been duly reciprocated.

His wife and children admired and loved him most because they knew him best. They loved him for his gentle character because they felt his unceasing tenderness, for his charity because they knew his kind deeds and forbearance, for his intellect because they knew its power. I knew each of his children well, and I have never known the relations of father and child more substantially true and tender. What good effects flow from a strong, true love that is full of sympathy served to form his character through over fifty years of exemplary home life.

His biographical sketch, with his eminent services to the State, his success at the bar and in public life, have already been graphically and beautifully told by my colleague.

Through his public and private life I have been a witness of his achievements. I have largely profited by his advice and experience, and never had friend a more honest counselor.

In his boyhood his life became a struggle with unfriendly circumstances, but he had the great good fortune to be born and reared on a farm, the place in which moral, mental, and physical stamina are best acquired, the place from which the greatest men of this country have gone into competition with their fellows and won success.

From this nursery of great men of our country he went as a youth, a member of the First Mississippi Rifle Regiment, to Mexico, and did his duty as a brave soldier. He returned to enter upon the practice of law before he attained his majority, and by his energy and rugged honesty, his industry, and his capacity for labor he soon won a great success and a reputation of being the greatest practitioner the bar had ever known in his State

He was for a long time State reporter, and wrote a digest of the laws of Mississippi, which is the vade mecum of the profession of that State, and served with great distinction as the chief justice of the supreme court, from which place he was called to the Senate of the United States.

During the exciting civil revolution produced by the campaigns of 1875 and 1876 Senator GEORGE was chairman of the Democratic State committee, and proved an executive ability of the highest order. He had, it is true, the unquestioning obedience of his party, which sprung from their absolute confidence in the wisdom, honesty, and patriotism of the man, but his informing genius and strong will organized the Democrats for victory.

When he came to the Senate, after a short experience in this Chamber, he remarked to me that he would like to be a member of the Judiciary Committee; that he was not a politician nor a statesman, but a lawyer, and that the best work that was in him could be brought out in that committee. This modest disclaimer of his ability as a politician and statesman will not be admitted by any man who knew him.

His record here attests not only his talents and acquirements as a lawyer, but also that wide acquaintance with public affairs, an intimate knowledge of the people and their wants, and the profound thought which make the statesman. He was a man exceedingly generous and unselfish in his friendships; he kept no accounts with friends. The only reciprocity he asked was that of feeling, and he served with equal zeal and readiness those who could never aid him as those who could be most useful to him.

Old schoolmates, still older friends, who, however willing, could no longer serve him were the constant objects of his thoughtful and tender care, and the more helpless they were the more generous was his devotion. While of rugged exterior, though of manly, grand physique, he cared nothing for conventionalities, and his courtesies were those that flowed from a natural goodness of heart.

He was thoroughly democratic in his association, and required of his companions neither position, power, nor wealth, but only uprightness of character and congenial temperament. In his charities no man that I have ever known of the same fortune has ever equaled him. The poor of his neighborhood and beyond it were the constant recipients of his bounty. Every case of distress received from him a generous response.

He particularly delighted to make comfortable the old soldiers who had served with him in Mexico and in the late war, and his charities were so unostentatious that the public knew of them only by chance. As a citizen he was public spirited and liberal, and in every good work he was foremost; whether to build a church or a schoolhouse, or any other matter of public convenience or use, he was the most beneficent giver.

He was easily affected by the griefs of others, and I have often seen his strong face wet with sympathetic tears at the story of distress. His mind was massive and vigorous, indefatigable in its operation, sustained by an energetic and indomitable will and an immense physical capacity for labor.

He was an unwearied student, surrounded himself with books, and was never satisfied with halfway researches. His mind was eminently analytical, working with great precision in his logical reasoning and following every thread of reasoning to its remotest consequence. Admit his premises, and his conclusions could not be denied. He was always careful and anxious about his facts, and spared no pains to verify his understanding of them.

This analytical faculty made his inquiries exhaustive; and when he had gone over a subject, there was very little left for those who followed. He had a rare combination of the synthetical with the analytical, and his constructive powers have left behind him the greatest monument to his genius in the present constitution of the State of Mississippi. His prescient mind foresaw the necessity for a new constitution that would deal successfully with the difficult problems of suffrage that threatened to demoralize the State, so he earnestly advocated a convention, and became with ease its leading spirit. In a body of men who have never been surpassed in a constitutional convention of any State he was acknowledged the head, and all eyes were turned to him for the settlement of all vexed questions.

He knew the people of Mississippi, having sprung from their ranks; he loved them; he trusted them, and devoted his great power to their service.

Sallust has said of a distinguished Roman of his time that the statues of his ancestors in the forum always moved him to a noble fury to strive by every means to emulate their great achievements. So the history of the struggles and achievements of this great and good man will long incite the youth of his State to emulate his illustrious example.

In his public career his solicitude was always about the plain people of the country. He preferred the committees which he thought would enable him to do them the greatest service. He asked me once: "Can you not help me find some work for the poor women of the South; some work for the spare moments from wearisome employment?" The sad condition of the poor, the hopelessness of female drudgery, the small and infrequent opportunities for improvement, the narrow life, the monotony, all appealed to him with pathetic power to mitigate in some manner the hard fortune of their lives.

One of the strongest characteristics of this strong man was his sustained and resolute purpose. It is said of the mountain cedars that—

> Moored in the rifted rock,
> Proof to the tempest shock,
> The firmer it roots them
> The ruder it blows.

So his purpose hardened and his resolution became more fixed by adverse criticism and opposition, yet withal he had no mere pride of opinion and never hesitated to yield to proof or reasoning better than his own. I have spoken of his charities to the poor and his tenderness to his family and friends, and I must now say that he regarded his enemies with little consideration and was prone to express his sentiments toward them with great frankness. Some of his work in the Senate has rarely been equaled by the greatest geniuses that ever illustrated its annals. His speech on the Treaty of Washington was declared by competent judges to be the ablest ever delivered in the Senate on a treaty.

His speech in the defense of the constitution of Mississippi was so rich in legal and constitutional learning that it surprised and discomfited all its adversaries and became an armory of weapons for all who spoke on like subjects afterwards. His report on the national inquest bill exemplified his powers both as a statesman and a lawyer, and his unpublished opinion on the unconstitutionality of the cotton tax, it is believed by those who have read it, would have changed the decision of the court on that question if it had been submitted.

To the world, to those who met him in daily life, to those who appreciated what Justice Lamar called his cormorant mind, that devoured and digested everything, there was a general opinion that his great intellect had never been directed to polite literature; but to the inner circle of his friends it was known that he delighted in the study of history and biography, in works of philosophy, in poetry and the drama, and in his lighter moods could talk delightfully about them.

His mind was not of the speculative cast, and he cared little for metaphysics; but he was keenly sensible to the beauties of poetry and the charms of eloquence. Oratory he never attempted, because the logical faculty dominated every other and appealed to the reason and not to the emotions.

He did not concern himself about the dogmas of religion, and accepted without question what was written in the Holy Scriptures. He had no taste for disputations theology and could not see the utility of religious controversies. He believed that conduct more than creed would fix his position in the future life, as it did in the present one.

This great man, this good man, good in his upright walk, in his beneficence, in his tolerance, in his sympathies, has gone out of this life into another life. We accompanied him with sorrowing hearts to the narrow door through which he passed. We placed his body to lie in cold obstruction. "Silence and darkness, solemn sisters," hold his mortal remains.

But beyond that door, who can say? This great soul walks through the dark shadow, through the narrow door, and into a brighter light. What powers he will there exercise, what hopes there realize, who can say? To me it seems as though he had gone out of this room into another. How long he will remain there, into how many other rooms he will successively go, what his final goal in the infinite progress of the soul, who knows?

You are told in the good book: "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord, that they may rest from their labors and their works do follow them." There is no certain voice that comes to us from that mysterious world. We dream dreams and see visions; but there is no certain information. Weeping we aspire, we strive, we reach upward, but the definite, the fixed is beyond us.

We know of him that where he has gone, if there be good souls, strong souls, this one will be of them. Throughout the borders of the great Commonwealth he served so well there is genuine sorrow for his loss, a grief that will not be comforted. They are proud of his greatness.

They called him the "Old Commoner," and other names expressive of affection and confidence. They sympathized with him in his struggles and in his successes.

Another who knew him well has said:*

> The unfavorableness of Senator GEORGE'S early surroundings merely gave him subjugation, which is as sweet as the conquest of a woman. He was an aggressive conqueror of opposition. His mind was like a restless and resistless tide that beats unceasingly upon the shores of opportunity until it has gained an everlasting ebb and flow thereupon.

> Variety of experience gives broadness; adverse experience, when it escapes bitterness, wombs charity; this is especially true of the latter when crowned with victory.
> Thus he had not only strength and broadness from contest and charity from both, but, like all great men, he had liberality.
> He knew right because he had seen wrong. He rightly used power in later years because he had felt the positive lack of it in former years—the mature strength was sweetly tempered by the early weakness.
> He loved a friend because he was thoroughly one himself. He despised littleness because he was so great himself. He contemned narrowness because of his own catholicity. If he hated falseness, it was because he was himself true.
> It was the omnipotent right in him that enabled him to detect evil in others; it was the broad charity of him that threw a mantle over their weaknesses. He never did right through fear, for courage was in his weakest sinew. It was indifferent to him if his virtues remained unknown; it was sufficient for him that he possessed them. His unselfishness challenged not only, but commanded emulation by others. If he became the example in virtues, it was simply because he went his way; he saw for himself and others, and it was natural for him to act as well for them as for himself. He was different from the mass of men, and therefore great; and by how much he was individual, he was greater, for his greatness not only within, but by comparison.

> Entombed in the modest little graveyard at Carrollton? Aye, his body. Forgotten because out of sight? Ah, no; morally brave? Look to his principles for answer. Physically courageous? Consult his comrades of the bivouac. If you would know how true he was, ask his friends; if how fair, ask his enemies; if how great a man, ask his native country. In life he was able to defend his good name; in his death it defends itself. And to detract from it is but to convict the detractor.

Mr. WALTHALL. Mr. President, before the vote is taken upon the resolutions I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that there be printed, in connection with the report of these proceedings, resolutions of the legislature of Mississippi and proceedings of the supreme court bar of that State upon the death of the late Senator GEORGE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PETTUS in the chair). The Senate has heard the request of the senior Senator from Mississippi. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Supreme court of the State of Mississippi, December special term, A. D 1897, Monday, January 17, 1898.]

The attorney-general, Mr. Wiley N. Nash, for the supreme court bar presented the following memorial and resolutions:

"Only a few months have passed since the lamentations of our people gave information to the world that J. Z. GEORGE, the jurist, soldier, statesman, lawyer, had gone beyond the confines of mortality.

"The death of a great and good man brings along with the sense of the loss it involves a better appreciation of how much can be made of life. Surely this thought is brought home to us in contemplating the character and achievements of him whose end we now deplore. To assert his preeminence on the bench, at the bar, and in the halls of Federal legislation, although a grateful task, is a waste of words in the presence of those who are so well acquainted with his great abilities, learning, and untiring industry. Still more pleasing to recollect and equally well known are his undaunted love of country, his inflexible integrity, his broad benevolence, and that sympathetic kindness and good nature that made him so dear to his family, his friends, and his neighbors.

"And the history of this great character is a lesson to the youth of the land he so much loved. His fame was no sudden growth, but the result of his own long-continued struggles against adverse circumstance, and built up block by block like some noble and enduring pyramid. He rushed not meteorlike across the firmament, but slowly ascended to the zenith of public usefulness and renown like some great luminary whose kindly light still lingers, to guide our steps, even after it has sunk in full-orbed majesty beyond the western sky.

"In his decisions as a member of the supreme court, in his published briefs, his digest and reports, he has left a lasting memorial of his ability as a lawyer and judge, but his patriotism and philanthropy have reared for him a still prouder monument that will forever hold its place in the hearts of his countrymen. Be it, therefore, by the bar of the supreme court:

"Resolved, That we will ever reverence and cherish the memory of our departed brother, J. Z. GEORGE, and would express to his sorrowing family our deep and tender sympathy.

"Resolved, These resolutions be presented to the supreme court with the request that they be spread upon the minutes and that a copy thereof be delivered to the family of the deceased.

"TIM E. COOPER,
"WILEY N. NASH,
"T. A. McWILLIE,
"W. H. POTTER,
"Committee."

To which the court, through Chief Justice Thomas H. Woods, responded, and ordered that the memorial be spread upon the minutes.

A true copy from the minutes.

[SEAL.] E. W. BROWN, Clerk.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I ask for the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and in accordance therewith (at 4 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being until Monday, April 11, 1898, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 7, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE YAZOO RIVER, MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Yazoo River at or near the city of Greenwood, in Leflore County, in the State of Mississippi," approved March 3, 1897, be, and the same is, so amended that if the actual construction of the bridge therein authorized to be constructed shall be commenced within one year after the date hereof, and if the same shall be completed within three years after the date hereof, the provisions of the act hereby amended shall remain in full force and effect, to all intents and purposes, just as though the construction of said bridge had been commenced and the same had been completed within the dates prescribed in said act.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CATCHINGS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

J. HENRY RIVES.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4918) for the relief of J. Henry Rives.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to pay to J. Henry Rives, of Virginia, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $885.57, being the amount of the attorney's fees and expenses necessarily incurred and paid by him in the arrest of John C. Henry, deputy collector, for embezzlement.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Claims were read, as follows:

In lines 5 and 6 strike out "$885.57;" and insert "$293.90."
In line 8 strike out "attorney's fees and."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I think there ought to be some explanation of this bill before unanimous consent is given. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. HAY. Let the report be read.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I will make an explanation of the bill. Mr. Rives, the beneficiary of the bill, was collector of internal revenue. An employee stole money——

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that his colleague [Mr. HAY] has called for the reading of the report. Perhaps it had better be read.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. PAYNE (interrupting the reading). I see that the facts of the case are stated on the second page of the report. The first page simply refers to other reports. I suggest that only the second page be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the latter part of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Rives was collector of internal revenue for the Fifth district of Virginia, and John C. Henry his deputy. February 5, 1874, it was discovered that his deputy was an embezzler to the extent of $36,241, and that he had fled. Thereupon Mr. Rives took prompt and efficient measures for his arrest and the recovery of the funds. The deputy was arrested, tried, convicted, and sentenced to four years in the Albany Penitentiary, and there was recovered from him in money and by sale of property over $31,000, leaving a balance of deficit of about $5,234, which was ultimately paid by his sureties. It is evident that this result was very largely due to the promptness, energy, and fidelity of Mr. Rives.

The expenses attendant upon the arrest and prosecution of the defaulting deputy were $885.57, which was paid by Mr. Rives from his own funds. No appropriation, it seems, was available to reimburse him. The claimant asks to be reimbursed the amount expended by him.

Under date of February 17, 1880, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue said, relative to this claim, in a letter to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House:

"Mr. Rives is entitled to commendation for the promptness and energy displayed in the arrest and prosecution of this defaulting officer and the recovery of the money, which was all deposited in a reasonable time. * * * Under the circumstances I think this claim is entitled to your favorable consideration."

Under date of February 1, 1884, the Commissioner, answering a letter of inquiry from this committee, said:

"In reply to the questions asked by the committee, I would state: First, that it does not appear from the records of this office that the embezzlement of Deputy Henry occurred through any carelessness or negligence on the part of Collector Rives; but, on the contrary, it was reported that his deputy conducted his fraudulent transactions so skillfully as to deceive the collector and evade the checks which had been established by the collector to prevent such frauds."

It further appears from the Commissioner's letter that it was Rives's duty, under the practice of the service, to cause to be arrested and prosecuted the defaulting deputy, such duty not forming a part of the duties of the special agents of the Department.

The following is a statement of the expenses incurred by Collector Rives:

Bills for telegrams sent to insure the capture of J. C. Henry	$93.90
Paid J. P. Farrant $50 and S. H. Carrick $50 for arresting Henry	100.00
Expenses in pursuit of deputy collector	100.00
Paid different attorneys in civil suits to recover amount embezzled	581.67

The committee are of opinion that Collector Rives should be reimbursed for the amount expended by him in the capture and conviction of Henry, as it was, as appears from the letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his duty to cause Henry's arrest. The amounts paid to attorneys in the civil suits, however, should not be allowed, because such suits were brought by the collector to protect himself, as he was responsible for the amount of the embezzlement.

The committee therefore report back the bill with the following amendments: Strike out the words "eight hundred and eighty-five dollars and fifty-seven cents," in lines 5 and 6, and insert in place thereof the words "two hundred and ninety-three dollars and ninety cents;" in line 8 strike out the words "prosecution and conviction;" in lines 9 and 10 strike out the words "and the recovery of the money embezzled;" and recommend that the bill do pass as amended.

Your committee would therefore report Senate bill 517 favorably, and recommend that it do pass.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to think, from the reading of the report, that this is a proper bill and that the money ought to be paid. I make no objection. There is no doubt that Mr. Rives was liable to the Government for the full amount of the defalcation. But the Government realized $31,000 of the amount from the defaulting deputy and the balance from his bondsmen. Mr. Rives was at the expense of arresting him—his own personal private expense—amounting to $293, which the bill as amended proposes to reimburse to him.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, if this bill involved any very large amount, I should certainly interpose an objection. I do not do so solely for the reason that the amount carried by the bill is small.

It appears that in this case there was a defalcation of $36,000 by a deputy collector of internal revenue. His resources were ample to make good about $31,000 of this liability, and the sureties paid the remaining $5,000; so that, as it appears from the report, the collector himself was not out a dollar by reason of the transaction except the expenses involved in the pursuit of the defaulter. The report gives him credit for diligence. I imagine that commendation is entirely unnecessary, as any man under similar circumstances would use all due diligence to protect himself. That is exactly what this collector did. He was liable for $36,000, and, resting under that liability, he necessarily invoked all the agencies of the law to capture the fugitive, and in doing this he involved himself in a personal expenditure of $293.

Now, then, as to the western district of Missouri, let me say there is now pending here a bill appropriating $12,000 to reimburse a collector on account of loss by a deputy collector. I do not know whether it has been favorably reported or not. It was so reported in a former Congress, but I am quite sure it has not yet passed Congress.

Of course if we enter on the policy of reimbursing collectors, not simply for losses incurred by reason of embezzlement, but also for the payment of their expenses incurred in the pursuit of criminals, we open, as gentlemen must understand, a very wide door. I shall not object, as I have stated, Mr. Speaker, to this bill, because of the fact that it involves a trifling sum. But I do not think it ought to be passed. It involves a bad principle and establishes a bad precedent.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman allow me? If the amount involved were larger, would it alter the decision or opinion of the gentleman regarding the bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. I admit, Mr. Speaker, that my position is a trifle illogical and inconsistent and that I should interpose an objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LOUD. I would further ask the gentleman if the passage of this bill would not be the establishment of an exceedingly vicious precedent, even though the amount is small, that will be used hereafter—and the debate on this bill be pointed to—to form the foundation for much larger claims of a similar character?

Mr. DOCKERY. I think it is very bad legislation and establishes a vicious precedent.

Mr. LOUD. I think this man got off pretty well, for my part. It seems that this collector was involved in a possible loss of $36,000. The deputy collector paid $31,000 and the sureties $5,000. He was only at a trifling loss, therefore.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is correct; a loss of but $293. As the gentleman says, he got off exceedingly well.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. The gentleman is mistaken in that. The amount paid by him was $885.

Mr. DOCKERY. And that was a personal liability incurred in pursuit of the defaulter or embezzler.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. At all events, he paid it, and he ought to be reimbursed.

Mr. LOUD. Well, Mr. Speaker, the question amounts simply to this: He spent about $800 to save the loss of $36,000, and now the Government is asked to reimburse the $800.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is an accurate, terse, and forcible statement of the exact condition of the case.

Mr. PAYNE. But. Mr. Speaker, that is not all. The gentlemen do not state the full case here. Now, the deputy gave bond to the Government——

Mr. LOUD. No; to the collector.

Mr. PAYNE (continuing). The deputy gave bond, according to the report, to the Government, and the deputy's sureties paid the balance of the deficit.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman will find that he is mistaken in that regard.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, the report so states. I am simply suggesting what I find in the report. I think the deputy collector also gave a bond. But, at all events, the report says that this loss was without any fault on the part of the collector and is in such a shape as to justify the relief asked here.

Mr. LOUD. But it was the duty of the collector to try to arrest the man, just as any other officer of the Government would have done, and to pay the expense himself.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman knows that the collector was responsible for the deficit——

Mr. LOUD (continuing). And he ought to be responsible for the expense incurred.

Mr. PAYNE. This is a different case from that which was acted upon by the House yesterday or the day before, which involved a principle absolving the party from all liability.

Mr. DOCKERY. What case does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. PAYNE. I refer to a case passed by the Committee of the Whole a few days ago, the case of the mint in Philadelphia. I am not certain exactly as to the day; but it involved the absolving of the principal from liability for money stolen.

Mr. LOUD. But that was not done by unanimous consent.

Mr. PAYNE. No; but it went through the House after a full consideration.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be no objection to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. I stated that I would not object, and suppose that I shall have to stand by the statement. I do not think, however, that the bill should pass.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. HAY. I object.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I hope the objection will be withdrawn.

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman will give any reason why the bill should pass or why the objection should be withdrawn, I will consider it.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Well, you heard the reasons, and they are set forth fully in the report.

Mr. HAY. I have heard some very good reasons from the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from California why I should object.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I suppose, of course, the gentleman has a right, if he desires to do so. But why should he object now when similar bills have been passed heretofore?

Mr. HAY. I do not think bills of this character ought to pass.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his objection.

Mr. HAY. I will withdraw the objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a statement to the House. In the Committee on Military Affairs, at the meeting this morning, all the members who were present——

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. The gentleman has withdrawn his objection.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. HULL. I will yield, if there is no objection.

Mr. KING. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

ARMY REORGANIZATION BILL.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, if I can have the attention of the House for a moment, I want to say that the Committee on Military Affairs, at the meeting this morning, by unanimous vote of all who were present—I will say, however, that all the members were not present—agreed to this proposition, that the reorganization feature of the Army bill, the three-battalion organization for infantry, is the question that they are more anxious for than any other feature of the bill, and that the committee are perfectly willing to adhere to the proposition that only the three-battalion part of the bill shall be pressed before the House. [Applause.] In other words, they are willing to have the bill amended so as to strike out the expansion of the companies, provided we can close general debate and go on with the bill without further delay or contention.

Under the five-minute rule, when any proposition is up, there will be ample opportunity for gentlemen who desire to express themselves upon the general feature of army reorganization; and I now ask unanimous consent that general debate may be considered as closed, and that we may go on to the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. SULZER. At 2 o'clock——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if he means the House to understand that the committee are going to move an amendment to strike out those portions of the bill except the three organizations?

Mr. HULL. The committee will move that amendment.

Mr. SULZER. We are willing to consent that general debate shall be closed at 2 o'clock, and that a vote shall be taken on the bill at, say, a quarter to 5.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let us have all the time we can get under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HULL. That is better. More time under the five-minute rule will be better.

Mr. SULZER. We want until 2 o'clock in general debate.

Mr. HULL. I will say that the committee are not anxious to cut off debate, and we will extend the time of any gentleman who wants to discuss the bill, so that he will not find any fault with the action of the House——

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand that a member of the committee objects to that arrangement. He desires general debate to close at 2 o'clock.

Mr. SULZER. We want to divide up the time on our side.

Mr. HULL. I am making the proposition that the committee authorized me to make; but I would suggest to my friend from New York [Mr. SULZER]——

Mr. ROBBINS. Has the committee got any amendment ready?

Mr. HULL. We have an amendment ready.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HULL. We will give you all the time you want under the five-minute rule, and you can take it on the first section, so that you can come in at once.

Mr. SULZER. They want time to discuss the bill generally.

Mr. HULL. They can. There will be no trouble about that when we understand that we can finish the bill to-day.

Mr. SULZER. Why not go on with the general debate until 2 o'clock?

Mr. PERKINS. What is the use of discussing the bill as it is when it is to be amended?

Mr. HULL. Yes; when there will be nothing left of it but the three-battalion organization?

Mr. OGDEN. What is left of it is a very important feature.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, then I simply ask unanimous consent that general debate may be considered as closed, and that we proceed to the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that general debate be now closed, and that the consideration of the bill proceed under the five-minute rule. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, under the statement of the gentleman from Iowa that, under the five-minute rule, there shall be liberal extensions to any member who desires to discuss the bill, or anything appertaining to it, for more than five minutes, I for one am willing to consent to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that it would be wise to have the extent of the extension suggested, or there may be difficulty arising from misunderstanding.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, this is not——

Mr. SULZER. Suppose anybody will want as much as twenty minutes. Will you have any objection to that?

Mr. HULL. Not a bit.

Mr. SULZER. Twenty minutes, then.

The SPEAKER. If that is the understanding, the Chair will put the question again. The gentleman from Iowa——

Mr. HULL. I would not agree that every man who speaks should have twenty minutes, because he might want to talk on anything on earth.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that would be the difficulty.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman will couple with that that a vote shall be taken at half past 4, I have no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON. A liberal extension.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that general debate be now closed. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMPSON. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HULL. Then I ask that general debate on the bill close at half past 1.

Mr. SULZER. Say 2 o'clock. I am willing to consent that general debate shall close at 2 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that general debate be closed at 2 o'clock. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOCKERY. A parliamentary inquiry. I would like to know about the division of the time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to find out.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I suppose I will control the time in favor of the bill. I do not know who will control in opposition.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I should like to hear what the gentleman from Iowa says; I am interested in the bill.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to know the time occupied by the respective sides.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, this bill was——

The SPEAKER. One hundred and eight minutes have been occupied by the friends of the bill and one hundred and fifty minutes by the opponents of the bill.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, this bill was carefully considered in the Committee on Military Affairs. It was reported to this House with the understanding that each member should have the privilege——

Mr. HULL. Has there been any arrangement made as to the division of the time?

Mr. SULZER. As I understand it, I am recognized in my own right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized in his own right.

Mr. HULL. What I was asking about was the division of the time.

Mr. SULZER. I believe I have the floor, and I will proceed.

Mr. Speaker, the bill was reported by the Committee on Military Affairs with the understanding, on my part, at least, that each member of the committee should have the privilege of taking such position on it as he desired. For one I desire to say that I am absolutely opposed to the greater part of this bill. The only part of the bill that I favor is the provision for the reorganization of the Army on the basis of three battalions.

There are, I believe, only three countries in the civilized world to-day which have their armies organized on the basis of two battalions. They are China, Persia, and the United States. Every civilized nation in the world which considers itself a military power has the modern organization of three battalions, and China, I am informed, is about, or has recently, adopted this modern plan of organization. I therefore believe that the Government of the United States should adopt the three-battalion system. I favor that part of the bill, and I hope so much of the bill will pass.

The chairman of the committee [Mr. HULL] has said this morning on the floor of this House that at the conclusion of the debate he would favor striking out all of the bill after the second section.

The first and second sections of the bill simply provide for the reorganization of the Army on the three-battalion system. That would not increase the number of the Regular Army, except to the extent of adding twenty-five additional majors. I can see no objection to that.

I am a Jeffersonian Democrat, and I have always been opposed on principle to a large standing army in time of peace. I am opposed now to any further extension of increasing the number of men in the Federal Army.

The laws on the statute books at present seem amply sufficient for enlarging the Army in case of war.

I make no criticism upon the Regular Army. It is a magnificent body of brave and loyal men. It has made history. I have only praise for its valor and glory. The Regular Army speaks for itself and needs no eulogy from any man. But I do desire to say a few words in behalf of the militia of the States and the volunteer forces of the Government, the citizen soldiery of our land. They constitute the flower of our land, the pride and glory of our States, and the reserved strength, greatness, and power of our country in time of war.

If this bill should pass in its, present shape, it would add to the Regular Army over 75,000 men. This bill is not a war measure; no one contends that it is an emergency measure. If it passes in its present shape, it would make the standing Army of the country a little over 104,000 men, and until these men were mustered in for active service there could not be and there would not be a chance for the service of volunteers or the militia. In other words, if this bill became a law in its present shape, there could not be a single military organization from any State and there could not be a volunteer force from any State mustered into the Federal service in time of war unless more than 104,000 men were required. This, in my opinion, would be unfair and unjust to the citizen soldiery of the States and to the volunteer forces of the country.

I believe in the citizen soldiery of our land. I take a deep interest in their welfare, and in so far as I can I shall always maintain their rights. The history of our country in time of war demonstates that there are no better soldiers. They are brave, patriotic, and intelligent. They come from the professions, from the workshops, from the counting rooms, from the mills, from the mines, and from the fields. There are no better fighters than those who come from the volunteer forces of the people. These volunteers constitute the great patriotic army of our country. They are no hirelings, no mercenaries; they fight for the defense of home and country, for principle and glory, for liberty and the rights of man. In time of peace they follow their usual trades, professions, and occupations. They do not menace our liberties or the stability of our free institutions. In time or war they constitute an army of intelligent, well-drilled soldiers as large as any army in the world. In a republic like ours a great standing army in time of peace is useless, expensive, and dangerous. In time of trouble we should and we must rely upon the volunteer forces of the country.

This bill, in its present shape, comes to us from the War Department, at the instigation of the officers of the Federal Army, to make places and secure promotions for them, and would be unjust to the volunteer forces and the military organizations of the States whose rank and file and officers devote days, months, and years of valuable time to practice, to drills, to tactics, and to organization.

If you pass this bill as it is now, you may just as well disband every militia company and every volunteer organization in our country.

I am glad that the chairman of the committee has agreed to strike out of this bill all the provisions increasing the Federal Army. He simply asks now, as I understand it, for the enactment of the first and second sections of the bill, which provide for the three-battalion system of organization. I can see no harm in that.

I believe good will come of it. Our Army in time of peace and in time of war should be organized on the basis of the best military organization in the world. As at present constituted it is organized on a basis now obsolete, and not followed by any other great military power in the world. We ought to be up to date in this as in everything else. The part of the bill to accomplish this should speedily pass. All the rest of it, and especially the part which seeks to increase the Federal Army, should be stricken out.

Mr. Speaker, such are my views and opinions on this bill. I give them to the House for what they are worth. I shall now and hereafter vote in accordance with them until I am convinced that I am in error. No act of mine will ever, I trust, lend assistance to the disorganization of our State military organizations, and no vote of mine will ever, I hope, be cast to chill the ardor, the loyalty, and the patriotism of the splendid and magnificent volunteer forces of our country.

While discussing this bill I may be pardoned, I hope, if I refer to the Cuban question.

Poor Cuba is now the one question uppermost in the thoughts and talks of the people of our land. It is fitting and proper that I should again raise my voice in behalf of the struggling Cuban patriots. We are told that the crisis is here, and that war with Spain is now inevitable. If such is the case, I have no fears of the result. Cuba will be free, our national honor will be vindicated, and Spain will be humiliated in the dust. We will teach Spain a lesson she will never forget; and the conflict should be short, decisive, and annihilating.

If we are on the eve of war, we are ready. I am one of those who believe either Spain or the United States must now back down. I am one of those who believe that we have now reached that crisis in Cuban affairs where nothing can be done by this country with honor unless we free Cuba.

As everyone knows who is conversant at all with the Cuban matter, there was a time when war with Spain could have been averted. In my judgment and in the judgment of almost everyone, that day is now passed. We must fight now for the independence of Cuba and our national honor, or we must retire in disgrace. We must bring about the freedom of Cuba and wipe out the stain Spain has put on our flag, or we must forever hereafter hold our heads in humiliation and shame before the civilized powers of the world.

Mr. Speaker, in the Fifty-fourth Congress a concurrent resolution recognizing the belligerent rights of the Cuban patriots was passed by an almost unanimous vote. It went to the Executive, and he quietly pigeonholed it. If he had signed it, the Cubans would have achieved their independence within six months. Nothing else was done by the Fifty-fourth Congress regarding poor Cuba and her frightful tribulations.

At the very beginning of this Fifty-fifth Congress—to be accurate, on the 20th of May, 1897—Senator MORGAN passed in the Senate of the United States by an overwhelming vote a joint resolution granting belligerent rights to the Cuban patriots. That resolution was sent to this House on or about the 20th day of May, 1897. The Speaker referred it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and it has slumbered in that committee ever since.

I am informed that the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House has never taken action on that joint resolution. It is well known that if that resolution had been reported to this House, as it should have been long ere this, it would have passed by an overwhelming majority. If it had passed, it would have become a law and the Cuban people long ago would have achieved their own freedom and independence.

Mr. Speaker, some one is responsible for the suppression of that joint resolution. Its suppression was a blunder worse than a crime. Who is the man? In a number of speeches which I have made heretofore on the floor of this House relating to Cuba I have called attention in no mistaken terms to the suppression of Senator MORGAN'S joint resolution granting belligerent rights to the Cuban patriots. All this trouble could have been averated if that resolution had passed.

Since the war for Cuban independence began, over three years ago, the Cuban patriots have persistently and continuously begged and pleaded that this country grant them belligerent rights. Give them this right, they said, and they would do the rest. If it had been done a year ago, or two years ago, no one doubts but that Cuba would to-day be a free and independent republic. During this time they were and are entitled to belligerent rights, according to the facts and by every construction of international law.

They are entitled to more now, and in my judgment we should at least recognize their independence. We should have recognized the independence of Cuba long ago. We have delayed too long. We have neglected too much. The order of the day has been procrastination. Our responsibility is great, and we will realize it before a great while. The people will judge you, and nothing you can now do will alter or change their judgment regarding your nonaction for three long years.

Mr. Speaker, the following is the joint resolution of Senator MORGAN I have referred to, and which I will now read:

Joint resolution declaring that a condition of public war exists in Cuba, and that strict neutrality shall be maintained.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a condition of public war exists between the Government of Spain and the government proclaimed and for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba, and that the United States of America shall maintain a strict neutrality between the contending powers, according to each all the rights of belligerents in the ports and territory of the United States.

Passed the Senate May 20, 1897.

Attest: WM. R. COX, Secretary.

From that day to this the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House has refused to report that resolution, notwithstanding the repeated efforts of Democratic members to force it to do so. It has been suppressed in the committee for almost a year. What a shame!

If it had been reported and passed, Cuba would have been free six months ago, and recent events would never have occurred. But now we should go farther, in my opinion. Now we should recognize the independence of the Cuban Republic. Recognition of independence is a fact, and we have a right to determine what constitutes a fact as well as Spain had when she recognized the Southern Confederacy in 1861. The Cuban Republic is a living fact. If we recognize the independence of the Cuban Republic now, if we had done so six months or a year ago, Spain could not justly complain. It is not and could not be construed as a casus belli. Spain could find no fault and would have no just cause of complaint against this Republic. This Government recognized the independence of all the South American Republics, and Spain never did and never could find fault.

If it is true that we have neglected our duty regarding this important question for the last two years, it is not yet too late for us to pass a joint resolution recognizing the independence of Cuba. If we do this now promptly and speedily, the Cubans will achieve their independence without any further help from us. The Cuban patriots do not ask the Government of the United States to intervene; they only ask for a recognition of their independence. We should grant it to them immediately. It is the least we can do.

They have been fighting their own battles; they have beaten Spain in every important engagement; they have conquered and hold more than three-quarters of the territory of the island; they have a stable government; they levy and collect taxes; they make and administer their own laws; they have a well-drilled army in the field; they have a permanent seat of government, and they say to us: "Give us recognition and we, with our own strong arms, will achieve our own independence." They ask for bread, and we give them a stone. We delay; we wait; we hesitate; we are to-day the laughing stock of the world. We should do our duty and let the President do his duty. We have waited here from Monday to Wednesday, from Wednesday to Monday, week in and week out, for the Executive to send his message to Congress. Why should we wait? Why should we not, as representatives of the people, do our duty and discharge our responsibility? Why should we not pass the joint resolution recognizing the independence of Cuba, send it speedily to the President, and let him take such action on it as he may deem fit and proper?

Let him sign the resolution or veto it, and let the responsibility for his action be upon his own head. Action on our part is what the people demand. No one here doubts that if the Committee on Foreign Affairs would report a joint resolution recognizing the independence of Cuba it would pass this House by an almost unanimous vote. Nine out of every ten members are in favor of recognizing Cuban independence. Why is the Committee on Foreign Affairs derelict in its duty? Resolution after resolution recognizing Cuban independence has been introduced in the House and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and there they sleep the sleep that knows no waking. The Committee on Foreign Affairs seems to be bound and shackled. It is impotent. It can not act unless the Speaker tells it to act, and the Speaker will not give the word. We are waiting, waiting, waiting, for a weak and wabbling Executive to make up his mind what to do. We are waiting for his message.

We know nothing whatever about it. We do not know that it ever will come. For one I have not yet given up hope. Perhaps next Monday, perhaps some day when it will be too late, a weak and apologetic message, similar to that submitting the testimony of the board of inquiry in regard to the tragedy of the Maine, may come in. For one I stand here and emphatically say I am opposed to further delay. I favor immediate action by this House. I am opposed to delegating the constitutional rights of the members of this House to the President of the United States. [Applause.]

We are the representatives of the people, and we ought to have the courage of our convictions. Let us be men. Let us do our duty. Let us be true to the people and to our constituents. Let us act here what we talk about so eloquently elsewhere. Let us do something regarding this Cuban question or admit to the world that we are slaves or automatons. In the lobbies, in the smoking rooms of this House, on the street corners, and in the hotels, you sing the eloquent song of Cuban independence, and tell how anxious you are to bring it about; but in this House, for some reason or other, you stand mute and silent. Under your breath you murmur and mutter and threaten revolt; but when the time comes for action, you fall in line and do the bidding of your master. What secret power holds you thus? Is it the awful power of the Speaker, or is it the fear of the avenging mailed hand of MARK HANNA?

You are very brave outside of the walls of this Chamber, but here you are afraid to open your mouths. You are the absolute creatures of some potent influence more powerful apparently than the will of the American people. If you act thus much longer the people will call you Speaker REED's "reconcentrados" or President McKinley's "pacificos." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Speaker, some time ago I introduced a joint resolution recognizing the independence of Cuba. It is buried in the Committee on Foreign Affairs, like many other resolutions on Cuba I have introduced. I can not get it out. I send a copy of it to the Clerk's desk and ask to have it now read, so that it will go in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read in the time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 220) for the independence of the Republic of Cuba.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the people of the Island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

That the Government of the United States hereby recognize the Republic of Cuba as the true and lawful government of that island.

That the war Spain is waging against Cuba is so destructive of the commercial and property interests of the United States and so cruel, barbarous, and inhuman in its character as to make it the duty of the United States to demand, and the Government of the United States does hereby demand, that she at once withdraw her land and naval forces from Cuba.

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, empowered, and directed to use, if necessary, the entire land and naval forces of the United States to carry these resolutions into effect.

That the battle ship Maine was blown up in the harbor of Havana February 15, 1898, and the lives of 266 American seamen and marines lost by the action of Spain.

Now, gentlemen, if you will vote here as you talk outside of the halls of this House, we can force a report of that resolution and pass it through Congress in twenty-four hours. The President will not dare refuse to sign it. It will become a law. It may avert war. Spain will probably back down, but at all events Cuba will be free in less than thirty days. [Applause.] Action on our part is all that is necessary.

Over a week ago one of the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS], in order, no doubt, to gain time, promised that the committee would report a joint resolution recognizing the independence of Cuba if the President did not send in the right kind of a message on the the following Monday. Monday has come and gone. No message. Wednesday has come and gone. No message. Will he send it in next Monday? I hope so. We all do; but if he does not, what then? Will the Foreign Affairs Committee report, or will it wait until the indignant members of this House rise up and force it to report the proper kind of a resolution?

You all know the frightful situation and deplorable condition of affairs in Cuba. Every day is momentous. Every day of delay here means the death of thousands of innocent, peaceable men, women, and children. The suffering, the misery, the crime, and the butchery there can not be told in words. It is beyond the expression of man. It has no parallel in history. It is unprecedented in the blackest annals of the world. How much longer are we expected to wait? How much longer must we be put off? The press and the pulpit ring with denunciations against our disgraceful conduct. Ninety-nine out of every hundred citizens in our land want us to do something. They want us to recognize the independence of Cuba, and, if necessary, maintain it by force of arms. That is my position. If I am not mistaken, that is the position of every Democrat here and of the Democrats generally of the United States.

Let us as the people's representatives have the courage to do our duty without waiting any longer. If the President will not lead, he must follow. We must take action at once. Any further delay on our part will be a criminal blunder. Our responsibility is great. We can not shift it nor evade the duty which stares us in the face. The press of the whole land rings with patriotic article after patriotic article asking us to do something. Our inaction is becoming a national scandal. It is becoming a disgrace. We have done practically nothing. We are doing nothing to help the starving, struggling, heroic Cuban patriots. Everything that the Government has done since the Cuban struggle began has been done in the interest of Spain and to help the Spaniards.

We have spent millions of dollars of the people's money during the last three years doing police duty for Spain along our coasts. We have arrested and imprisoned our citizens on the alleged charge of trying to help the Cuban patriots, but they have violated no law, national or international. We have done everything in our power to prevent the Cuban patriots from buying arms, food, clothing, medicine, and the munitions of war. We have appropriated $50,000,000 to get ready for something, and we appropriated it without a murmur. We do not desire to harshly criticise the President; we have too much respect for the great office he holds; but we think it is only fair that he should take us into his confidence and let us know what he is going to do, how he is going to do it, and when he is going to do it.

Mr. Speaker, the duty of the House of Representatives in regard to Cuba is now and for the last two years has been imperative. The way we have ignored this great question should bring the blush of shame to the cheek of every liberty-loving citizen in our land. At the beginning of the Fifty-fourth Congress I introduced a joint resolution granting belligerent rights to the Cubans, and subsequently, on the 2d day of March, 1896, in a speech I made on the floor of this House I said:

The Cuban patriots are entitled by every construction of international law to belligerent rights. They have in the field a standing army of over 40,000 men. They have proclaimed their declaration of independence, similar to our own, and, in the opinion of many, more justifiable. They have adopted a provisional constitution, republican in form. They have elected a president, a vice-president, and a constituent assembly. They have a cabinet of ministers. They have a seat of government, and are in possession and hold three-quarters of the island. They are competent to-day to treat and negotiate with any other sovereign people on the face of the globe.

They have maintained their army in the field against the great army of Spain, under the command of her first Captain-General, for more than a year. They have won important and decisive battles. They are unconquered and unconquerable. They are a brave, long-suffering, and patriotic people. They ought to win, and they will win. We do not know what is going on in that island to-day, because Spain fears the light of truth; because Spain fears investigation; because Spain hates to allow the people of the world to know how she is conducting the war there. She has established a censorship of the press, of the cable, and of the post-office that is an affront and an insult to the intelligence, the progress, the civilization, and the enlightenment of the last decade of the nineteenth century.

On the 17th day of December, 1895, I offered the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Joint resolution declaring that a state of public war exists in Cuba and that belligerent rights be accorded to the Cuban Government.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Government of the United States recognizes a condition of public war between the Government of Spain and the government proclaimed and for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba; and the United States of America hereby declare that they will maintain a condition of strict neutrality between the contending powers and accord to each all the rights of belligerents in the ports and territory of the United States. The Congress of the United States protest and remonstrate against the barbarous manner in which the war in Cuba has been conducted, and the President is hereby authorized to take such steps as may be expedient, in his judgment, to secure an observance of the laws of war as recognized by all civilized nations.

That is all the Cuban patriots ask for or want. I introduced it at their request. It is moderate and conservative, but it accomplishes the object desired, hoped for, and prayed for. I had indulged the ardent hope that the Committee on Foreign Affairs would report it and that it would pass Congress.

Regarding the adoption of that resolution I said in that speech:

If you will pass this resolution, I have no hesitancy in predicting that Cuba will be free and independent ere the end of the year. [Applause.]

If it is not done, what then? Well, sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. Congress will have to act, or the people of this country will say to their representatives and those in authority, in the words of the poet Watson:

"Betrayers of a people, know thy shame."

And what I said then is true to-day.

In that same speech, speaking of the contest the Cubans were making, I said:

These brave, noble, heroic Cuban patriots are fighting a battle of republicanism against monarchy; of democracy against plutocracy; home rule against the bayonet; the sovereignty of the individual against the sanctity of the king; the ballot against the throne; American liberty against foreign tyranny; and above all and beyond all, they are fighting a battle for the rights of man. They must and will succeed.

And I predicted that—

Spain can not win. She can not again subjugate Cuba. Her greatest generals meet with defeat in every important engagement, and her resources are drained to a condition of national bankruptcy. She can not carry on the war much longer and must soon admit her inability to quell the revolution. From what I can ascertain and from what I can learn from the best and most authoritative sources, I know the Cubans will accept no terms but the freedom of the island—no more faithless promises of reform; nothing but absolute independence.

That was true then, and it is true now. The Cuban patriots will accept no armistice, no more reforms, no system of autonomy. They will accept nothing but independence or death. God help any Administration in this country that will cooperate with Spain to coerce the Cuban patriots to accept anything but independence.

That joint resolution of mine granting belligerent rights to the Cubans was never reported from the committee of this House, although I did all I could, in season and out of season, to get it reported.

Senator MORGAN's resolution, which passed the Senate, is very similar to it, and after it came to this House I abandoned my resolution in favor of his. The committee never reported it.

On the 17th day of June, 1897, I presented to this House a monster petition in favor of the immediate passage of Senator MORGAN'S resolution, and, as the RECORD will show, I then said in a short speech which I made:

We are wasting time here day in and day out while hundreds and hundreds of American citizens are languishing in Cuban jails for no offense whatever. Our trade with Cuba ruined, our flag fired upon, our citizens robbed, insulted, and assassinated, or driven like wild beasts from their homes and farms in the interior of Cuba to the Spanish fortified towns on the coast to starve, to sicken, and to die! The history of the last two years' struggle in Cuba is the saddest in all the annals of the world. It is high time this great Government should protect its citizens and their property in Cuba. It is high time we should intervene in the name of humanity, civilization, and Christianity, and put a stop to this brutal, bloody, devastating carnage.

These citizens of the United States in Cuba look to this country for their rights and protection. Apparently they look in vain. The flag of their country, which should protect them, is spit upon by the brutal Spaniards. These cruel and bloodthirsty Spaniards trample our flag in the dust, ignore treaty rights, and bid defiance to this great Republic.

It is time for us to act. If we do not, we will stand disgraced in the opinion of our own liberty-loving citizens and before the Christian powers of the world. If we do not put a stop to the fiendish barbarities and refined cruelties of these Spanish brigands, our boasted republicanism will become a byword and our flag of freedom a reproach and a farce. How long shall we submit? How much longer shall we permit poor Cuba to be a human shambles?

The joint resolution of that venerable Senator and friend of humanity, Mr. MORGAN, granting belligerent rights to the Cubans, should be speedily submitted to a vote of this House. Some one is responsible for its suppression. Somebody is responsible for its delay. Who is the man? * * *

The American people to-day are in favor of granting to the Cuban patriots belligerent rights. If that question could be submitted to the people of this country, they would decide in favor of it by an overwhelming majority. They would like to know why no action has been taken by this House on that joint resolution of belligerency. * * * We allow our citizens to be butchered, murdered, and assassinated in Cuba without a protest. * * *

The American people want Cuba to be free. They will see to it sooner or later that Cuba is free. I do not know who retards the joint resolution. I do not know who is responsible for the delay in procuring action upon it, but I do know that the day of reckoning is not far distant, and the American people, who sympathize with those brave and struggling Cuban patriots, will hold some one responsible.

* * * * * * *

All that I then said was true, and you know it to-day. Many of you sneered and laughed then, but you do not dare to sneer or laugh now. The American people at last have found out who are and have been responsible for the suppression of debate on Cuba, and for the defeat of all legislation in behalf of the Cuban patriots.

The Republican party is responsible. No one who will read the record can escape this irresistible conclusion.

Mr. Speaker, yet again, on the 19th day of last January, in a speech I made in this House on the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, I said:

The situation in Cuba demands immediate action, and the American people are in favor of aiding the Cuban patriots by extending to them belligerent rights. This should have been done long ago. There is not a member of this House who does not know that if the joint resolution granting belligerent rights to the Cubans which passed the Senate a long time ago by an almost unanimous vote was permitted to be voted on in this House it would pass here by an almost unanimous vote. I do not hesitate to say that nine-tenths of all the members are in favor of it. Some one is responsible for the suppression of action on that joint resolution.

The people of this country would like to know who is responsible—whether it is the Speaker, the President, or the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The time is not far distant when we will find out. We shall know. The Republican party can not escape responsibility in regard to this matter. The people, irrespective of party, all over this country want Cuba to be free. Newspapers all over this country are in favor of granting to the Cuban patriots belligerent rights. Congress should have done so at the very beginning of the war in Cuba. This is not a partisan question and can not be made so. It is a question of right, honesty, justice, and patriotism. Everybody knows that there is war in Cuba. The Spanish monarchy almost daily admits it. No one doubts it. Thirty days after Sumter was fired on, Spain recognized the belligerent rights of the Confederacy.

Mr. OGDEN. And rightfully, too.

Mr. SULZER. Well, we did not complain, and Spain can not justly complain if we recognize the belligerent rights of the Cuban patriots. International law justifies it. We ought to take prompt and immediate action in regard to the frightful situation existing in Cuba. It is proper and humane and all well enough to send provisions, to send money, to send medicine, and to send clothing to the sick, starving, and distressed victims of Spanish barbarity in Cuba, but we should do more—we should send down the North Atlantic Squadron to the gates of Havana, stop these outrages, and aid the Cuban patriots to achieve their freedom and independence, as France aided the Revolutionary colonists in their struggle for liberty and independence.

The Democrats in this House are in favor of passing the joint resolution granting belligerent rights to the Cubans. The Republicans have persistently refused to permit a vote on the question. The people of this country will hold the Republican party responsible for that action at the coming election. We will meet you on the stump all over this country, and we will tell of your recreancy on this important question, and the people will condemn you. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, page 818.)

And again on the same day, discussing the same bill, I said:

I wish to submit a few words regarding the situation in Cuba and to show the country the position on this question of the party of great moral ideas before and after the election, with a commentary by the distinguished gentleman who presides over the destinies of this House and who apparently controls all legislation of the representatives of the people of the United States.

The Republican party in national convention assembled in 1896 said regarding Cuba:

"From the hour of achieving their own independence, the people of the United States have regarded with sympathy the struggles of other American people to free themselves from European domination. We watch with deep and abiding interest the heroic battle of the Cuban patriots against cruelty and oppression; and our best hopes go out for the full success of their determined contest for liberty. The Government of Spain, having lost control of Cuba, and being unable to protect the property or lives of resident American citizens, or to comply with its treaty obligations, we believe that the Government of the United States should actively use its influence and good offices to restore peace and give independence to the island."

That is the Republican national platform. On that platform Mr. McKinley stood before the people of this country. In his letter of acceptance he said that he believed in every word contained in that platform, and, if elected, he would do his best to carry out the promises and pledges therein contained. Let us see how he has done it. Let us see if he has kept the promise. I read from the President's message, submitted to the Fifty-fifth Congress on the first Monday in December, 1897, regarding the Cuban situation. After giving a brief history of the various insurrections, the various outrages, the various brutalities of the Spaniards in Cuba, he sums it all up by saying:

"For these reasons I regard the recognition of the belligerency of the Cuban insurgents as now unwise, and therefore inadmissible."

What a complete change of front! What a betrayal of a sacred trust! What a difference between now and then!

That is what has made cowards of you all; that is the reason you have changed your tune; that is the reason you sing a different song now. And a little further on he says:

"It is honestly due to Spain and to our friendly relations with Spain that she should be given a reasonable chance to realize her expectations and to prove the asserted efficacy of the new order of things to which she stands irrevocably committed."

"The new order of things to which Spain stands irrevocably committed" is the subjugation of Cuba by the ruthless extermination of the last Cuban patriot. That is the Republican party "before" election and the Republican party "after" election: and the comments I desire to read upon that record of infidelity, upon that record of betrayal of the people's confidence, are the comments of the Speaker of this House, delivered at Alfred, Me., not very long ago. In a speech on that occasion Mr. REED said:

"Boasters are worth nothing. Deeds are facts, and are forever and ever. Talk dies on the empty air. Better a pound of performance than a shipload of language."

The Republican party gave the people of this country "a shipload of language" during the last national campaign; and now when it can carry out its promises it refuses to give the people "a pound of performance." We appeal from the outrageous parliamentary tactics perpetrated by the Republicans on the minority members of this House to the American people. We appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober. We point to the record and ask for judgment. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, pages 820 and 821.)

That is the record, and you can not now escape the responsibility of all that has occurred for the past year. I have no desire to severely arraign you, but I ask, and I have a right to ask, that you do something now. No more delay.

Mr. Speaker, we Democrats of the minority stand ready and willing to help you Republicans of the majority in every way that we can to aid the independence of Cuba and vindicate our national honor. On the 8th day of March, 1898, in a speech on the bill appropriating $50,000,000 for the national defence, I said, in regard to this phase of the Cuban question:

This is a time for the exhibition of the greatest degree of patriotism and for the exemplification of the smallest degree of partisanship. This is the time for action and not for talk. This is the time for unity, for harmony, and for us all to stand together shoulder to shoulder for the safety and the greatness of the Republic, for the grandeur and the glory of the flag, and for the vindication of American honor.

* * * * * * *

In a time like this there should be no parties and no party politics. We should all be patriots, and act with a singleness of purpose for the best interest of all the people and for the greatness and glory of the Republic.

* * * * * * *

No member of this House has more persistently and consistently for the past three years advocated and championed Cuban freedom and Cuban independence than I have. It is now a matter of great personal gratification to me that at last we are alive to the gravity of the situation and that Congress is about to do something and take decisive action.

It should have done so long ago.

In my judgment we should have recognized the independence of Cuba or granted her patriotic sons belligerent rights long ere this. We have waited too long. We have delayed too much. If we had taken decisive action, as we should have done, a year or two years ago, this crisis would have been averted and Cuba would to-day be free and independent and in her proper place among the proud nations of the world.

* * * * * * *

Cuba is lost to Spain forever, and Spain knows it.

* * * * * * *

In conclusion permit me to say, as a member of this House representing as loyal and as patriotic a constituency as exists to-day in the country, that no one will do more, that no one will go further than I will, now or hereafter, to do all in my power to promote the national defense, uphold and maintain the national honor, and support and strengthen the hands of the President to speedily bring about what every liberty-loving American citizen wants to see—the freedom and the independence of Cuba.

A month has come and gone since then, and we are still asked to wait and be patient.

God knows we have been patient. We have waited long and have borne much. Pending delay, the Spanish minister insults our Chief Executive; the Spaniards at Havana blow up one of our finest battle ships and send to a watery grave 266 American sailors, as brave and patriotic as ever faced an enemy. Spain destroyed the Maine by a mine. We know, and the world believes, she is guilty. No one doubts it. That barbarous act was a cause for war. It was a declaration of war. It was the most fiendish, the most brutal, the most barbaric act of its kind ever perpetrated in the history of the world, but it was characteristic of the cruel, catlike, fiendish, bloodthirsty, bull-fighting Spaniard. There is not a man to-day in all this land who has read the testimony taken before the naval board of inquiry who does not believe in his heart that the Maine was sunk by a Spanish mine, touched off by Spanish agency. If that crime had been committed against any other great power on earth, there would have been war within five days. We are too slow. We hesitate too long. We put up with too much. We are too patient.

The President asked us to suspend judgment regarding the tragedy of the Maine. The people of our land, broad-minded, cool and collected, slow to anger, and level-headed, patient, and patriotic, suspended judgment. But the time is at hand when they will suspend judgment no longer. Unless something is speedily done to vindicate American honor and the glory of our flag; unless something is speedily done for the freedom of Cuba; unless something is speedily done to demonstrate that we are a brave people and a great people, conscious of our rights and willing to maintain them, the world will charge us with cowardice. We are no cravens, no cowards. Let us prove it now. [Applause.] Let us act now.

We suspend judgment against Spain no more. We come to take judgment against her. She has no true defense to make. The great American press is doing for Cuba more than Congress. And in that respect let me say to you that when the historian comes to write the true history of the heroic Cuban struggle for freedom and independence he will say, and truthfully say, that the New York Journal did more to bring it about than any other single agency in the land. The New York Journal is an American paper for the American people. Regarding the frightful crimes, the brutalities, and the cold-blooded assassinations in Cuba it has told the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Everything it has printed has been corroborated by members of this House and by members of the Senate who have been to Cuba as its commissioners and have seen for themselves. It has given us and the people not only the news day by day, but it has given us ocular demonstration from the camera. Who can gaze on these frightful pictures and hesitate as to his duty?

No one who has seen these terrible pictures, no one who has read the terrible news, no one who has listened to the eloquent but dispassionate speeches of Senators PROCTOR, THURSTON, GALLINGER, and MONEY, will suspend judgment any longer. If we do not act now we stand disgraced in the eyes of our own people and in the estimation of all the powers of the civilized world. The selfishness of Wall street must not interfere with the performance of our patriotic duties. We can not neglect the most sacred duties of life in order to please a few manipulators of the market. We must carry out the mandate of the American people and make Cuba free, or the American people will hold us responsible now and hereafter. They are aroused, and woe to the man who is recreant to his trust.

Mr. Speaker, my position is well known and unchangeable. Long, long ago I made up my mind. I have never deviated from the first stand I took. I want to see Cuba free. She must be free and independent. The Spaniard and his yellow flag, the emblem of atrocity, must go.

You know that in all the history of the world no people ever deserved the right of self-government more than the heroic, struggling Cuban patriots. For centuries they have been oppressed, robbed, starved, and murdered by a cruel foreign power. The tyranny of Spain, her refined butcheries, her fiendish brutalities, are the blackest pages in the annals of the world.

What a sad story the history of poor Cuba tells! For more than three centuries Spain has ruled her with a bloodstained and an iron hand. It has been a thousand times worse than the rule of the Turk. It has been a thousand times worse than the rule of a barbaric military despotism over a conquered and subjected province.

The history of poor Cuba's trials, her woes, her troubles, and her tribulations never has been written and never will be written. Not half the truth will ever be known. And more the shame!

Spanish rule in Cuba has been one long, unending, hideous carnival of crime, of public plunder, of rapine, of official robbery, of murder, of starvation, of destitution, of assassination, and of cruel, torturing death—a frightful big black blot on the pages of civilization, a lasting, burning disgrace to all Christendom, an impudent, imperial challenge, backed by the bayonet, to the sober sense of humanity and the Christian civilization of the world. [Applause.]

No pen can depict, no human tongue can tell, one half of poor Cuba's woes and miseries. The horrors of Spanish rule in Cuba are beyond the conception of the human intellect.

Captain-General after Captain-General has come and gone, leaving behind a trail of blood and a pitiful record of pillage, of plunder, of rapine, of crime, and of death in all its forms. But Cuban patriotism has never been conquered. It has lived on and hoped on, and as the years rolled by has become more intensified, more united, and more persistent, until at last the bright dawn of Cuban independence is at hand and Cuba will be free.

From the very beginning of her struggle for independence I have been an ardent friend of Cuba, a pronounced sympathizer of the Cuban patriots, and a strenuous and persistent advocate for their freedom and independence. I shall not change.

I have made many speeches on the floor of this House in favor of granting the Cuban patriots belligerent rights or in favor of recognizing their independence. Every prediction that I have made regarding Cuba is true to-day. With every other liberty-loving American citizen, I want to see the Cuban patriots win their independence; and if we will do our duty, they will win.

We must give our ultimatum to Spain, and it must be that Cuba must be free; that the wanton butcheries, the frightful horrors, the fiendish brutalities, the bloody assassinations, and the willful extermination of innocent men, women, and children in Cuba must be stopped, and stopped at once. As I have said before, we want peace with honor; but there can be no peace with honor unless Cuba receives her independence. The Spaniard must go, and the Spanish flag must be hauled down on the Western Hemisphere. Spanish rule on this side of the Atlantic is at an end. It has always been a disgrace to civilization and to Christendom.

Spain has run her course. Her days of conquest are no more. She is bankrupt; she is obsolete; she is a Bourbon, never forgetting, never learning. Her throne totters, and the monarchy hangs in the scale, trembling for its existence.

Weyler, the greatest criminal of the age, has gone. But the bloody Blanco is carrying out his decrees. He is just as bad; one like the other—no difference.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard much of late about the President's policy of intervention. The President has been promising for several weeks to send to Congress a ringing patriotic message in favor of immediate armed intervention. Let us look into this for a moment. Let me say to you that as I understand it the Cuban patriots do not want armed intervention unless they are recognized as independent. Independence must come first. Intervention can follow, if necessary to maintain it. That seems to me to be the proper policy.

There can be no intervention, it seems to me, with justification unless we recognize the independence of Cuba or declare war against Spain. The Cuban patriots, battling as they are and have been for three years and more for freedom, for liberty, and for the right of self-government, do not intend to give up now. All they ask for, as I am informed, is the recognition of their independence. They do not ask for the armed intervention of this Republic. Recognize their independence, they say, and they will achieve their own freedom. Recognize their independence, and they will drive from the territory of the fairest island in all the world, the gem of the ocean, the last vestige of Spanish rule and Spanish domination.

They believe, and I believe, that if this Government will recognize their independence, England and every South American and Central American republic will also recognize their independence. This, in my opinion, is the first thing we should do. We should have done it months ago. It is not yet too late. Let us do it now.

Mr. Speaker, I believe now that if we will but do our simple duty, as I conceive it, and recognize the independence of Cuba, the Cuban patriots will speedily win. It will give them the right, by virtue of international law, to buy arms and munitions of war; to buy a navy; to fly their flag on the high seas; to sell their bonds, and to raise money. Give them this right of recognition, I say, and they will be able to cope with Spain in every way and will soon be free by their own stout hearts and their own strong arms. No doubt they can do this.

Look at the situation. According to the best statistics Spain has only about 75,000 soldiers in Cuba, and most of them are disabled. The Cuban patriots have 40,000 well-drilled soldiers, armed and thoroughly equipped. They can put 100,000 more men in the field if they have the rifles and the ammunition. Give them a chance to get 100,000 more rifles and 2,000,000 cartridges, and the Cubans in thirty days will drive the last Spaniard from the coast of Cuba without any aid or assistance from the United States. If you want to avoid war, do this, my friends, and in my judgment we will escape war. Yes, independence, and not intervention, is what the Cuban patriots ask us for. Let us, then, be brave and manly and recognize the fact, and give the proper recognition.

Why, may I ask, all this talk about intervention? In whose interest is intervention? Not in the interest of the Cuban patriots. Will it be in the interest of the Cuban sugar-plantation syndicate, whose agents reside in the New England States? Will it be in the interest of the Spanish bondholders and Wall street, or will it be for the political interest and the aggrandizement of the Republican party? Let some one on the majority side of this House answer.

Mr. Speaker, I stand now where I always have stood, where I will stand until the last—for the liberty-loving people of Cuba, who are making and have made as heroic and as gallant a battle for freedom and independence as any people ever made in the history of the world. [Applause.] I want to see them win, and I know they will win if this great Republic, which should stand as a shining light, as a beacon, and as an example for all the other republics of the world and for every people struggling for liberty and independence, will simply do its duty. [Applause.]

Let us pass a joint resolution recognizing the independence of Cuba. Let us do it at once without waiting further for a message from the President or for the consent of the Speaker.

Let us do our duty, and then let us hope the Executive will do his duty. If he believes in delay, if he believes in a policy of procrastination, I know of no reason why we should. There is not a member on the floor of this House who can rise in his place now and tell us what the policy of Mr. McKinley is or will be regarding the Cuban question. No one seems to know. There does not seem to be a man in Congress who can tell. Is there any reason to believe we shall be able to know more about the President's policy next week, or the week after next, or next month, or the month after next?

Many people of this country, I am afraid, are beginning to think that Mr. McKinley is not a free agent. A great many people will soon believe he has no mind of his own. If he does not do something pretty soon, the people will ere long believe that he is a mere automaton. [Laughter.] He wabbles; he waits; he hesitates. He changes his mind. Our countrymen are beginning to believe that something must be wrong. Many no doubt think that one day he listens to the nobler impulses of his own heart—and he has a good heart—and to the patriotic dictates of his own conscience—and his own conscience must tell him his imperative duty—and that the next day he listens to his alleged owners and advisers, HANNA, McCOOK, ELKINS, and the agents of Wall street. The American people will rebel against being governed by the agent of MARK HANNA. Take my word for it, the American people will never consent to be governed by any man who is not big enough to own himself. Let those to whom this applies take heed lest they fall. A word to the wise is sufficient.

Mr. Speaker, you know and I know that the American people are to-day aroused as they have seldom been before. They demand to know what we, their representatives, intend to do to help free Cuba. Do not mock them. Make no mistake; they will know. They want to know what the President is going to do about it, and they will know. There comes a day of reckoning.

We are waiting and waiting. For what? For the President to make up his mind; for the Executive to come to some conclusion. The American people have made up their minds long ago. They want us to act. They want us to do something. We can not gather courage by inaction and irresolution. If we are going to do anything regarding Cuba we must do it now. This talk about intervention will be ridiculous in a few weeks more when the rainy season in Cuba begins. Everyone knows who knows anything about Cuba that it will be impossible for our American soldiery to operate with any degree of success in Cuba during the rainy season. The dread disease of yellow fever will be more potent then than bullets from Spanish rifles. Now is the time to act. The watchward of the Administration should be action! action! action!

Mr. Speaker, for one I do not think the President is dealing fairly with Congress. Do you not think it was his duty to send some message to the representatives of the people telling them what he intended to do and when he would do it? We are waiting, but we are waiting in vain. I hope we will not have to wait after next Monday. We are neglecting the true performance of our duties. You gentlemen do not fully appreciate how intense the feeling is among the American people generally on this Cuban question. You do not know how they chafe under these unexplained and incomprehensible delays. I sincerely hope you gentlemen of the majority have some conception of how aroused, how embittered, how humiliated, and how disgusted the rank and file of our constituents are by these delays and these postponements. They will hold the Republican party responsible, no matter what may occur or happen hereafter. The skirts of the Democratic party are clean. For three years we have been trying to accomplish something for the freedom and independence of Cuba.

You know that the Democrats on the floor of this House have over and over again, in season and out of season, endeavored to pass Senator MORGAN'S joint resolution granting belligerent rights to the Cuban patriots. The majority, controlled by the Speaker, has frustrated our efforts. You know, and the world knows, that the Democrats on the floor of this House have time and time again voted to pass a resolution recognizing the independence of Cuba. But the Republican majority has persistently voted against every attempt that we have made. We are in the minority. We can not do anything but vote and demonstrate our sincerity and good intentions. The Republican party is charged with the responsibility of legislation.

It has most signally failed to carry out its promises regarding Cuba. The people of our country to-day know that if you Republicans did what you ought to do Spain would be compelled to get out of Cuba in twenty-four hours. You should not have delayed a week after the Maine was destroyed. There is not an intelligent man in our land who has read, or will read, the testimony of Captain Sigsbee and the other survivors of the Maine who escaped Spanish treachery and Spanish destruction who does not believe Spain deliberately destroyed our vessel and assassinated our citizens. That crime must be atoned for.

The proof of Spanish guilt is clear. The testimony is conclusive. If Spain was on trial for her life and the proof was as strong and as convincing, any jury in the land would bring in a verdict of guilty.

Spain shall not escape for this terrible crime against the laws of God and man. The Maine tragedy must not be lost sight of. It ought to be made a casus belli against Spain.

All honor and all glory to the heroic crew of the Maine. They were as brave and as gallant a crew as ever sailed the sea or challenged a foe. They died in the service of their country, and their countrymen will not forget the deep damnation of their taking off. They died in the cause of Cuba, and Cuba must be free at least to atone for their death. They sleep to-day on Spanish soil, but ere the autumn winds blow again over the Queen of the Antilles they will, if we are true to their memory, be sleeping under the Cuban flag or under the flag of the country they served so well. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I am one who believes in peace with honor, and I say now and again there can be no peace with honor until Cuba is free and the crime of the Maine is atoned. The sinking of the Maine is no mere incident, but is one of the most frightful crimes ever perpetrated in the history of the civilized world. When comes the day of judgment?

I am no jingo crying for war for the sake of war; but there are things more horrible than war. I would rather be dead upon the battlefield than live under the white flag of national disgrace, national cowardice, national decay, and national disintegration. Yes, gentlemen, I believe if you had done your duty, if you had passed the resolution of belligerency or the resolution for independence, there would have been no war, and Cuba would be free. Many believe that war is now inevitable. If it must come, the quicker the better. If it comes, we have nothing to fear, nothing to be ashamed of. We appeal to the enlightened judgment of the world for the justice of our cause. Let us make it short, sharp, crushing, and decisive.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is the duty of this Government now, before another hour or another day goes by, to serve notice on the Spanish monarchy that her torpedo flotilla must not leave the harbor of the Canary Islands. I believe this Government should serve immediate notice on the Spanish monarchy that she must get out of Cuba; that we will not tolerate her kind of administration on this hemisphere, and that if she does not get out and give the Cuban people their independence, we will recognize them and help them to achieve it, just as France helped our revolutionary fathers in the dark days of '76.

We must be firm. We must stand up for the right. We must help the weak and oppressed. There is nothing the American people despise so much as a weak and impotent foreign policy. It will wreck any Administration. There is nothing that will destroy our Republic so quickly as national cowardice. We must maintain our rights or sink into national decay. Let us all stand together for the glory of our country. We know our own greatness and our own power. We are the greatest Republic the sun of noon ever looked down upon. We are invincible and invulnerable. [Applause.] If Spain desires trouble, so much the worse for poor old Spain. Let us teach her our greatness in war. That will be an object-lesson to the world. Every one knows, who knows anything about our Army and our Navy, and her army and her navy, that if she goes to war with us she will be crushed and humbled to the dust in thirty days. [Applause.]

We must do our duty and fear nothing. Let us do what we know to be right, and let the consequences take care of themselves.

Let us, then, at once meet the paramount duty of the hour and recognize the independence of Cuba. There are many who believe that if this is done at once there will be no war and that Spain will soon give up the contest and get out of Cuba. But, war or peace, let us do our duty.

Oh, for one day of an Andrew Jackson in the White House, with his courage, his backbone, his nerve, and his patriotism! If a man like Jackson were at the helm of the ship of state there would be no more delay, no more hesitation, no more apologies, but he would say in trumpet tones that would shake the very throne in Madrid, "Onward the whole fleet; forward the whole line. And let the battle cry be 'Cuba must be free!'" [Long applause.]

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. How much time is left to the gentleman from New York?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has thirteen minutes remaining, five of which go to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX], which would leave eight minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, this bill, as it is proposed to amend it, will simply be a bill to reorganize the Army under the three-battalion system or basis. When amended, that is all there is in this bill. Necessarily in every battalion there must be a major, and the effect will be to increase the majors to the extent of twenty-five, so that is all this bill will cover when it is properly amended, in time of peace. In time of war, so as to reach the battalion system, two new companies will be organized, because you can not reach that system without them. The size of the companies remains as now authorized by law. They can at no time go beyond 100 men, and then, to reach that, war must exist.

A little matter has occurred since yesterday that has made a very great impression upon me. My friend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] is not present, but I want to pay him a very high compliment, and I think that yesterday I treated him a little wrongfully. I know he was very eager to get two large regiments into the permanent Army in time of peace that cost the people $560,000 a year, and I could not understand yesterday why he did not want to put any men in the Army with muskets in their hands. I understand it now. Whenever a man is going to be governor, you know he will be commander in chief of the forces of the State, and the gentleman from Missouri thought this bill might run in on some of his Missouri troops. I am sorry that I made the mistake of trying to take away any of his command.

One other thing, and then I am done. Yesterday we wanted to fill up the Army because it was expected that war would come. We were sitting here tied up to the very highest pitch, expecting a great declaration or recommendation of war from the President of the United States. Then it did not come, and so we concluded, as sensible men, that there was no necessity of increasing the Army, and went back and left the law just as it was except for that change in the organization. Now, when the war does come, I imagine my good friend [Mr. DOCKERY], whom I appreciate as such, coming from the great State of Missouri, heading the militia of the State with great strides of valor, and war on his brow, for he can get as serious as a preacher sometimes, when he undertakes to do it. I assure him now that from this time on I will never advocate anything that takes one of the men away from that intended great governor of the State of Missouri. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, it is my desire to address a few suggestions to the provisions of the bill exclusively. It has been found agreeable by some on this side that I conclude this debate against this measure because of my previous attitude toward this subject. I join, of course, very heartily in the patriotic and eloquent sentiments expressed by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] upon the immediate demands of Cuba. If I had a creed to place before the House upon which I would pin its faith, I would inscribe that text simply in the words that I used in my late speech upon this question: "The freedom of Cuba is a sentiment, the avenging of the Maine a duty," and there I would rest the discharge of our duty.

But I desire the attention of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and call the attention of the House to the fact that I am very much like the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS]—I am interested in this bill, and somewhat personally; and as the rules of the House require that I should make that known personally, I do not hesitate to do so. If this bill goes into effect as now provided it legislates me out of office. I am at present an officer of the National Guard of the State in which I live.

The most cordial associations and the dearest moments of my life have been intertwined within the social associations as well as the sacrifices attending that Guard. While that to some extent stimulates and inspires me to investigation of this measure, there are greater influences. This House will recall that I informed the gentleman from Iowa on the 17th day of January, when I stood in this House making my speech on the "passing of representative government," said that it was his purpose and the purpose of his committee to eventually bring forth in this Chamber a bill that would have for its object the strengthening and increase of the National Army in time of peace. He at once made the accusation in that very patent invective, that I was talking "claptrap." Some of his party papers throughout the country appended to me the antique anathema of a "demagogue."

I desire to bring now as a witness to this House this bill as brought in by this honorable gentleman as chairman of the Military Committee, the first section of which reading: "A bill providing for the organization of the Army in time of peace." Mr. Speaker, according to the provisions of this bill, it would increase the Army by 255 officers of the infantry and 31 in the other arms of the Army, and bring the standing army to 105,000 men; and, coupled with the National Guard of this country, taking the serviceable men, you have in the service at the present the highest, greatest, and numerically the strongest standing army in the world. What think you now, sir, of the accusation you made against me? Was I not right, and you unconstitutional?

Mr. Speaker, a theory of organization brought forth in this bill is given as the excuse for the measure. It is said that it is a war measure. We have no war upon us. If it is a war measure, it can not possibly succeed. Far from stimulating the patriotism of this country by inducing those to join the Army who fight for their homes and firesides under the command and leadership of friends and neighbors, you have no other purpose in this bill than to provide for 250 officers who have been graduated at West Point, who have no other hope than promotion to life service under this law.

There is no other object in this bill, and you can not keep the secret longer from us. Your real mission concerning this is to give these positions to these men. I am opposed to that. I am tired of such a reigning influence in this country. I shall, as heretofore, fight any organization composed of gilded military satraps on the one hand and tasseled society sapheads on the other. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] I am opposed to every form and frame of the measure, because as a war measure it is futile, empty, and delusive, and so it has been shown in the best armies in the world.

I remind the distinguished gentleman that this measure is wholly without value. France tried your measure. She had her officers who were educated at St. Cyr. She tried that system under Napoleon III. She assembled her soldiers from the vine-clad cottages and from out of the hamlets and hillsides of that poetic country under the command of the graduates of her colleges, and they lost the battles for Napoleon III and yielded the victory at Sedan to the Germans. England has tried your policy. In 1872 she made such recommendations. It was attempted by Lord Derby, and had been by Lord Cardiff before him, but it proved a failure, and now it comes from the honorable Lord Bulwer, commander in chief, that the same system was considered in England and declared a failure.

These condemned courses were the same as the prospective plan that is now here considered. After an exhaustive trial it has been demonstrated to be a failure. A great many gentlemen around me have said that the only countries that have their armies on the formation that our Army is formed are China, on the one hand, and Persia on the other. I would remind gentlemen that while that may have been true seven years ago, it has not been since. The Chinese army has been re-formed. They have formed it on the English plan, and to-day are considering a general revision because of that English report that such a policy serves no good purpose.

That I would indicate to the gentlemen of this House how absolutely ineffectual would be this plan of organization, I call to your attention the fact that there will be 3,000 men under the command of a colonel, and 2,000 under the command of a major and a multitude of captains and lieutenants, and not one of these officers to bear the slightest relation to the men under his control. The captains and lieutenants will be neither friends nor neighbors of those under their control, the officers of these men to be "West Point graduates," and their main stimulus, "seeking the bubble reputation in the cannon's mouth," will be to drive the men into battle, irrespective of sentiment or regard for their lives or safety, and exterminate them in order to maintain the "official reputation" of these national officers. This can never be the theory of the National Guard, the armed force in a free country, intended to oppose foreign invasion in a State. This attempt to put armed power in the hands of the selected few in order to give power and exemption to the few favored and place the burdens of government and the right of authority upon the weak, is not a new question.

The Marquis of Beccaria wrote an essay and sent it down to the constitutional convention of this country, and it was read and commented upon by Governor Morris, of Pennsylvania. The doctrines asserted by these gentlemen now as something new have been in every form confronted, combatted, and overthrown time and time again. Their establishment has ever been regarded as a blow against the ranks of the poor and the army of the toilers, and to bring them forward now is to bring something obsolete and oppressive which has been tried and proven a disaster when successful and a failure when not oppressive and tyrannical.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this measure aside from the fact that it has no merit and has no utility as a measure of organization. I am opposed to it because, as I have said on this floor with such humble ability as I possessed, I will fight consistently every measure that will tend to reduce this country to imperialism and to place upon the standard Cæsarism instead of freedom. Increase the standing army in order to provide berths for a favored few, for those who may have graduated at West Point and hold now the privileges of this nation. This is the object of the law; make mercenaries of our volunteer soldiers and martinets of every insolent military understrapper. Let these men work for a living as men, and be entitled to the consideration of the American citizens.

We are not pensioning these distinguished gentlemen by giving them official titles as favor; we are not creating an official army for the purpose of satisfying the yet unsatisfied ambition of these pampered maudlins. Unless these gentlemen can come with some measure which will add to the efficiency of the Army by adding inspiration and influences which bring to the country's defense patriotism, which is essential in the hour of her trial, this measure has no purpose and is futile and should be defeated. The soldiers now in command or service will be protected and dignified; where there are faithful services these officers will be honored. The gentleman says the law may be remedied by some amendments. It can not be amended so as to give it the qualities which it lacks. It lacks constitutionality. It is devoid of Americanism. It is an engine of oppression and the stealthy destroyer of the weak.

I conclude my sentence. I said the bill could not be amended, and to continue the illustration that you could not amend this bill so that it would be efficient, because the bill stands as the artist's work of "Virago." It may sometimes bear the maidenly smile of virtue, yet there is something so vicious and odious hidden within it that it has the look of distortion, the form of infamy, and the purpose of crushing to death all who shall come within its embrace.

Mr. HULL. How many sentences does the gentleman want to conclude.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. My concluding sentence is to sentence the gentleman from Iowa to political oblivion if he imposes this bill further upon the country. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I have been much interested in the speech of my distinguished friend from Washington, but he fails to point out any part of the bill that increases the number of officers or men in the time of peace. There is no difference of opinion between Democrats and Republicans on the committee in regard to that. I do not want to take up the time of the committee, for I want to yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] ten minutes.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I have been much surprised at the remarks of the gentleman who has just taken his seat. The gentleman seems to think that he is the only Democrat on this floor. He has implied, if he has not stated, that the Democratic members of the Committee on Military Affairs were—I can not exactly catch the always distinguished language which the distinguished gentleman uses—but that we were tessellated somethings and brazen somethings else, I do not know what. [Laughter.] However that may be, the gentleman is entirely mistaken in the object of this bill.

I propose to discuss the bill from the standpoint which was announced by the chairman of the Military Committee this morning, and that was that we did not propose to increase the Army one particle; that an amendment would be offered by the committee which would take from it the objections which have been raised by gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber; that there would not be any increase whatever of the Army in the time of war, except of 5,000 men, which is now authorized by law, not officers, because it seems that it is the officers that want to lead the National Guard and do not want to be kept out of this fight which they say is imminent, but which I do not believe is ever coming. I say we have eliminated and taken from the bill the sting which seems to have struck the members of both sides of this House.

There will not be a single officer added to a single company or a single regiment, except the twenty-five majors who will be necessary to carry out the three-battalion formation provided for in this bill.

Now, the gentleman from Washington has repeated to us a great deal of history. He tells us that England has tried the three-battalion system and has abandoned it. I defy the gentleman to point to any authority showing that England has ever tried the three-battalion formation. She has stuck to her old system beginning in the seventeenth century and coming down to the present time. And the greatest military authority in England to-day says that if that country should have a war with one of her strong neighbors, it would be necessary for her to have the three-battalion formation in order to succeed.

I say that this three-battalion organization which we insist upon is one which is now used by Germany, the greatest military power on earth, and by France, and by all the civilized countries except Persia, China, and perhaps one or two others that have gone back in their civilization.

Now, I want to call attention to the fact, and to insist upon it, that this bill, when it shall be amended as the committee proposes to amend it in this House, will be in such shape that the National Guard will not be affected by it in any way. I want to call attention to the fact that the National Guard of New York and Pennsylvania have now the three-battalion system, and that if those military organizations should now be mustered into the service of the United States, instead of continuing the battalion system which they now have, they would be compelled to adopt the system which is by law the system of the United States Army. That is the law; and they could not get away from it.

Therefore, I say, this bill will help the National Guard throughout the country in adopting the system which is recognized to be the best infantry system that can be used by any army. There is no possible argument that can be used against the system which we propose. Notwithstanding the argument of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, the bill can be amended without the least trouble in any manner which may be desired; and therefore it will not be necessary to recommit it.

When gentlemen talk about the National Guard they are talking alone about those troops which are under the control of the governors of the States. The militia of the United States and the National Guard of the United States are two separate and distinct things. The National Guard are State troops, under the command of the governors of the different States. The militia are the men of this country between the ages of 18 and 45 who are subject to military duty.

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. MARSH. I do not want the statement the gentleman has just made to go to the country uncontradicted. I deny that there is any distinction, so far as the power of the National Government is concerned, between the National Guard and the militia. They are all comprised within the provision of the Constitution which makes the President the Commander in Chief of the militia of the United States. There is no military organization of the States that is not the militia of the United States.

Mr. HAY. Notwithstanding the statement of the gentleman, I adhere to the statement I have just made, and if the gentleman will take the trouble to examine the law he will find that what I say is true. Perhaps if he had taken the trouble some little while ago to do this there would not have arisen the conflict there has been in this House over this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not care to occupy further time in speaking upon this measure. It seems to me that the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs this morning that this bill would be amended in accordance with the evident wish of the majority of this House ought to be entirely satisfactory to all. For myself, I never desired—and I can say for the committee of which I am a member that they never intended or wished to bring in any measure here which would in any way affect the efficiency of the National Guard or prevent them from going to the front when the country is attacked or when the country attacks somebody else. We all recognize the fact that the citizens of this country are the soldiers of the country; that they are the people upon whom this Government must rely in time of war.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. HUNTER. If the National Guard were called out as a body to-day by the President of the United States, directly or through the governors of the States, could they go into the ranks of the Army as a National Guard organization?

Mr. HAY. Yes; as I understand.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The law expressly says that they shall.

Mr. HUNTER. I mean under this bill.

Mr. HAY. This bill does not touch or in any way whatsoever interfere with the National Guard. It says not a word about the National Guard. It leaves the existing law to operate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. HAY. I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] to yield me three minutes more.

Mr. HULL. I will do so.

Mr. HAY. I wish to answer more fully the question just put by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HUNTER]. I say that under this bill the National Guard is not touched; and if the President were to call upon the governors of the States for troops, those troops would enter the Army as an organization—as organized regiments, officered by their own colonels, their own majors, their own captains; they would be a separate and distinct organization. This bill does not touch that. The law remains just as it was.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Will the gentleman allow an interruption for a question?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I would like to ask my friend if he does not understand that this bill creates 175 new officers, or an addition of 20 per cent to the officers now in the standing army; and that they would take command in the Regular Army, including also the State militia and the volunteers, should they be called into service?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I was discussing this bill, as I stated, from the standpoint on which the members of the House must vote on it. The amendments to be offered by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will eliminate any objection that may be raised in the direction the gentleman speaks of. I am discussing the bill now as it will be before the House, finally, for its adoption.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I mean the portion of the bill that is still before the House after the proposed amendment.

A MEMBER. But that does not appoint any additional officers, except in the event these skeleton regiments are filled up. This does not make any additional colonels.

Mr. HAY. The bill would make an addition in time of peace of one major to each regiment. There are twenty-five infantry regiments, but in time of peace—not war—there will be one additional major to each regiment; that is to say, the bill will provide for the three-battalion system. A lieutenant-colonel will command one of the battalions, one major will command one, and the other major the third. That is all that the bill provides.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. That is correct.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Where do you get the other officers, the subordinates, lieutenants, and captains?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the bill increase the number of regiments?

Mr. HAY. It will not, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. Does not the bill provide for the increase of the Regular Army to 104,000, exclusive of the National Guard?

Mr. HAY. Why, Mr. Speaker, I have just stated to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEWIS], in response to his inquiry, that I am discussing this bill from the standpoint of the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that that provision will be stricken from the bill and the Army remain just as it is now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a report at this time.

Mr. HULL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BELKNAP].

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. I ask consent to submit a report that will take but a moment.

Mr. HULL. If it comes out of the time allowed for debate, I can not yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time for general debate has been fixed for 2 o'clock. The Chair will recognize the gentleman after that to submit the report.

Mr. BELKNAP. Mr. Speaker, I had no intention whatever of saying anything relative to the pending bill until the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEWIS] made his remarks a few moments ago, and although I do not think he intends to be unfair in his statement, I must say frankly that he made suggestions which are manifestly unfair and statements that are not founded on the present situation relative to this bill as it comes from the Military Committee. He stated that the Committee on Military Affairs was desirous of increasing the Regular Army. I as a member of that committee and as a Republican most heartily oppose increasing the Regular Army either in time of peace or in time of war. And his accusation therefore is unjust and unfounded upon facts.

This bill—and we must consider it now simply as it comes to the House to be voted upon—every feature of the bill will be eliminated except the sections that provide for a modern organization of the regiments. That is all there is to it. As our organization is now, it would be absolute murder to fight the men. We will have a new organization under the bill; and, mark you, gentlemen, that will bring the Regular Army up to the perfected standard of organization now in vogue in the National Guard throughout the country.

Mr. OTEY. Does not this bill increase the standing army in time of peace 5,000 men?

Mr. BELKNAP. No, sir; it does not increase it one man.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It increases it just twenty-five—twenty-five officers.

Mr. OTEY. Does it increase the number of officers for each regiment or companies in each regiment?

Mr. BELKNAP. No, sir; it does not; and I will state to the gentleman that I would be utterly opposed to it if it did. I will say to the gentleman, further, that I am absolutely fair and frank in my statement that all I would vote for is the reorganization of the Regular Army to put it on a modern basis. That is all I ask, because, Mr. Speaker, when war comes I believe that the volunteers and the militia of this country should have the opportunity to fight for our flag, and they will properly and nobly defend it. [Applause.]

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. BELKNAP. Certainly.

Mr. MARSH. I understand it is now proposed to strike out all of the bill except the first and second sections.

Mr. BELKNAP. I believe that is correct.

Mr. MARSH. Will you now inform the House how many men will be increased in the Army, and how many officers, by the sections remaining after the bill is perfected?

Mr. BELKNAP. You mean in time of peace?

Mr. MARSH. I mean at any time. The bill, I believe, does not go into operation except in time of war; but what would be the increase, under the second section, of officers and enlisted men when it does go into operation? I ask the question because the impression prevails with many members that the adoption of the first and second sections will perfect the new organization, or permit the reorganization, but will not add officers or men to the Army.

Mr. BELKNAP. As I understand it, that is the case, and if it is not the case, I will not vote for it.

Mr. MARSH. Well, it is not the case.

Mr. BELKNAP. Very well, sir, then I can not vote for it. I took my feet so that I would not be placed in the position of advocating an increase in the Regular Army.

I want simply a modern organization for the Regular Army, not an increase. I will not vote for a bill that will shut out the National Guard or militia and the volunteers by the Regular Army.

Mr. MARSH. If you vote for the second section, you do increase it.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. That was my understanding from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] yesterday, and I investigated the matter, and sanction his remarks this morning. I have no intention of being unfair to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. BELKNAP. Of course there is an increase of 25 majors for the modern organization.

Mr. LACEY. And also 100 lieutenants and 50 captains.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the President in his discretion establishes a third battalion, and so forth, as he is authorized to do in section 2, what will be the increase of officers and men?

Mr. MARSH. My colleague says there will be no increase under the second section.

Mr. BINGHAM. Suppose the President establishes a third battalion in time of war. It says he may establish a third battalion to each infantry regiment.

Mr. MARSH. My colleague understands that the adoption of that very section does not increase the Army, does not authorize the increase of the Army, either in enlisted men or in officers.

Mr. BELKNAP. Beyond what the present law allows. I will ask if that is not so?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I want to take up the first and second sections of the bill for a minute. The first section provides——

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the gentleman will give the information desired by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HULL. The first section provides—

That hereafter the peace organization of each regiment of infantry now in service shall embrace 1 colonel, 1 lieutenant-colonel, 2 majors, 10 captains, 12 first lieutenants, 10 second lieutenants, 1 sergeant-major, 1 quartermaster-sergeant, 1 chief musician, 2 principal musicians, 2 battalions of 4 companies each, and 2 skeleton or unmanned companies; the organized companies to be constituted as now authorized by law: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as abolishing the office of chaplain in each regiment of colored troops.

The colored troops have regimental chaplains. Now, that provides for an increase in time of peace of 25 majors, and 25 majors only. The language will not admit of any construction beyond that. It takes the 8 companies as now organized by law and divides them into 2 battalions, where there is now 1 battalion, and provides a major for the second battalion.

Mr. OGDEN. Right there, now, I want to ask what becomes of the other 2 companies?

Mr. HULL. It leaves them as they are.

Mr. OGDEN. Then you would have to amend the section.

Mr. HULL. Not at all. It leaves the 2 skeleton companies as they are now, in time of peace.

Mr. OGDEN. How can you divide 10 companies into 2 battalions of 4 companies each? What becomes of the other 2 full companies that we already have?

Mr. HULL. There will be 2 battalions of 4 companies each and 2 skeleton companies.

Mr. OGDEN. It musters the men out of the service, then, and leaves 2 companies skeleton?

Mr. HULL. They are already skeletonized, and the officers are detailed to teach in the colleges of the different States of the Union, and there is not enough of them to meet the demand for the colleges and schools of the United States; and we are now besieged to increase the number, so that the Government of the United States can furnish these instructors.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Why do you provide for 12 first lieutenants?

Mr. HULL. Because one first lieutenant is detailed to act as quartermaster, and another first lieutenant is detailed to act as adjutant.

Mr. CONNOLLY. That is for detail, but you are providing for the regular organization.

Mr. HULL. That is where the adjutants and quartermasters of the regiments will be filled from.

Mr. CONNOLLY. But they will have 12 first lieutenants, and then detail others in addition, as is done now.

Mr. HULL. Not at all.

Mr. CONNOLLY. That is the case in the Army now.

Mr. HULL. That is not the case in the Army now.

Mr. CONNOLLY. They detail an officer for adjutant and an officer for quartermaster.

Mr. HULL. Yes, and that is the reason you get 1 extra first lieutenant for adjutant and 1 extra first lieutenant for quartermaster now.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Why do you not say so?

Mr. HULL. It is clear enough now.

Mr. CONNOLLY. It is not clear enough. It depends on the construction of the Department.

Mr. MORRIS. I should like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if there are not 2 skeleton companies under the present law?

Mr. HULL. Yes; that has been stated here over and over again.

Mr. BARROWS. Mr. Speaker, perhaps I am the only one here who has any curiosity about the provision the gentleman from Iowa just read, "that nothing herein contained shall be construed as abolishing the office of chaplain in the regiments of colored troops." I wish to ask if it is presumed that the colored troops need chaplains and that the white troops do not?

Mr. HULL. The chaplains for the white troops are, as a rule, post chaplains, but the regiments of colored troops are provided with chaplains for the regimental organizations, they being kept together more as regimental organizations. It was feared that if that was not put in, the construction of the law would be that these offices would be abolished. The white troops have their chaplains in their posts.

Mr. BARROWS. I suppose I am the only one who has any professional interest in the subject.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. I think in the gentleman's statement yesterday he left the House under the impression that the President, under the existing law, could double the present force of the Regular Army. Upon what authority does the gentleman make that statement? Let me submit to the gentleman that in 1877 the Army appropriation bill contains the following provision:

For expenses of recruiting and transportation of recruits, $90,000. And no money appropriated by this act shall be paid for recruiting the Army beyond the number of 25,000 enlisted men, including Indian scouts and hospital stewards. Nothing, however, in this act shall be construed to prevent enlistments for the Signal Service, which shall hereafter be maintained as now organized, and as provided by law with a force of enlisted men not exceeding 400 after present terms of enlistment have expired.

That was the act of 1877, but I come to the act of 1885 and I find this:

And there shall not hereafter.

That is the first time the word "hereafter" appears in the Army bill.

For expenses of recruiting and transportation of recruits from rendezvous to depot, $107,302.50. And no money appropriated by this act shall be paid for recruiting the Army beyond the number of 25,000 enlisted men, including Indian scouts and hospital stewards; and thereafter there shall be no more than 25,000 enlisted men in the Army at any one time, unless otherwise authorized by law. * * * And there shall not hereafter be expended out of appropriations made for the support of the Army any money for the support of the Signal Service or Corps, or for any purpose connected therewith, other than the pay of such commissioned officers as may be detailed by the Secretary of War for service therein, except such sums as may be specifically appropriated therefor.

That is the statute law. The old law no longer runs. The President has no power beyond the existing law, which is a limitation of 25,000, "unless otherwise authorized by law."

Mr. HULL. The President will have absolutely no power to recruit the Army except the Congress authorizes him. Now, let me read you what I think everybody will find, considering the whole statutes and considering the law as to infantry organization.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman allow me, in that connection?

Mr. HULL. I will when I get through with my statement. The law provided:

1079. Each company of infantry shall consist of 1 captain, 1 first lieutenant, 1 second lieutenant, 1 first sergeant, 1 quartermaster-sergeant, 4 sergeants, 4 corporals, 2 artificers, 2 musicians, 1 wagoner, and 50 privates; and the number of privates may be increased, at the discretion of the President, not to exceed 100, whenever the exigencies of the service require such increase.

Mr. BINGHAM. What was the date of that?

Mr. HULL. The date of the enactment was away back.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am disposed to think that the law in the appropriation bill repeals it.

Mr. HULL. That was whenever the President thought there was an exigency, and that law has never been repealed. There was a limitation as to the number of enlisted men in the Army, but no limitation over the men whenever Congress authorized the employment of additional troops. I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania will admit that this law governs and fixes it. In fact, the President can enlist additional men when authorized by Congress.

Mr. BINGHAM. Yesterday the gentleman left an impression on the House that on the ipse dixit of the President he could do it.

Mr. HULL. We were discussing this only as a war measure, and assumed that Congress would authorize more troops. The limitation as to number of men in the Army leaves the law forming companies in full force, and when the number is increased the President can fill the companies. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to go on to the second section.

Mr. DOCKERY. Right at that point I want to submit an inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time for general debate has expired.

Mr. HULL. Wait until we read the section, and then I will take the floor.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—PATTERSON AGAINST CARMACK.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE submitted the views of the minority in the contested-election case of Patterson against Carmack, Tenth Congressional district of Tennessee, which, under a previous order of the House, were ordered to be printed.

ARMY REORGANIZATION BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the peace organization of each regiment of infantry now in service shall embrace one colonel, one lieutenant-colonel, two majors, ten captains, twelve first lieutenants, ten second lieutenants, one sergeant-major, one quartermaster-sergeant, one chief musician, two principal musicians, two battalions of four companies each, and two skeleton or unmanned companies; the organized companies to be constituted as now authorized by law: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as abolishing the office of chaplain in each regiment of colored troops.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 12 insert, after the words "colored troops," the proviso:
"And provided further, That the vacancies in the grade of major created by this section shall be filled by promotion according to seniority in the infantry arm."

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. DOCKERY. I wish the gentleman from Alabama would allow me to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HULL. The question will first be on the amendment of the committee, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DOCKERY. We are not ready to vote. I desire the gentleman from Alabama to give way to me to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HULL. I take the floor simply to find out what the gentleman wants to inquire about.

Mr. DOCKERY. Following up the inquiry propounded by the gentleman from Pennsylvania—because I did not catch the reply of the chairman of the committee—as I understood the chairman of the committee yesterday, he stated that under the existing law the President has the right in time of war to increase the Regular Army to about 42,000 men. Not knowing anything to the contrary, I very gracefully assented to the proposition.

Mr. HULL. My proposition was, assuming that Congress would authorize the calling out of troops, I think the very minute the limit of troops organized in the company is authorized it can be increased, as I read by the law this morning.

Mr. DOCKERY. But the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Pennsylvania read a section of the statutes which, in my judgment, absolutely, it seems to me, forbids an increase.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not believe the President has power to do it, unless Congress permits an organization under this act of 1885.

Mr. DOCKERY. What I want the House to understand is that the President has no authority to increase the Regular Army to 42,000 men.

Mr. HULL. Unless he is authorized by law.

Mr. DOCKERY. Why, certainly.

Mr. HULL. So that contention would be settled without any specific organization of the Regular Army if Congress provided for an increase of the troops. That is not before us now. So that it is not necessary to have a judicial decision. I believe under the law, never repealed, if there is an authorization under the discretion of the President to meet an emergency arising, of course he can do it; but I think my friend will be mistaken if Congress grants the additional troops. Without that is authorized, then it is not given.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is a very important matter.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am not antagonizing the gentleman. I wanted to bring to him information that he might bring it to the House.

Mr. HULL. In the debate yesterday it was not fully followed out.

Mr. DOCKERY. But the chairman stated that the present law authorized the President in time of war to increase the Regular Army to 42,000 men.

Mr. HULL. You have got to assume that Congress authorized him to call for troops. I believe the size of the company would be fixed by the law.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word for this purpose: It was my intention to make some remarks upon the National Guard, but I now desire to put into the RECORD a letter from the War Department, in reply to an inquiry of mine, wherein they state the actual strength of the Army of the United States at stated periods in each year from 1789 down to 1897. In reply to my inquiry, it is stated that during the war of the rebellion the regular forces only numbered 23,000 men. I will read it:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 7, 1898.

SIR: In reply to your telegram of yesterday to the Assistant Secretary of War, asking the size of the Regular Army during the war, embracing number of regiments and number of enlisted men, I have the honor to inform you that the authorized strength of the Regular Army during that period was as follows:

	Enlisted men.
6 regiments of cavalry	7,248
5 regiments of artillery	4,606
19 regiments of infantry	26,783
Miscellaneous, engineers, ordnance, noncommissioned staff, etc	2,461
Total authorized enlisted strength	41,158

The actual enlisted strength of the Army during the war did not exceed, however, an average of 23,000 men.

I inclose a printed statement showing the strength of the Regular Army at various periods in each year from 1789 to 1897.

Very respectfully,

THEO. SCHWAN,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

Hon. H. H. BINGHAM,
House of Representatives.

*The returns of the Army covering these years are incomplete, and the authorized, instead of the actual, strength is here shown.

SAM'L BRECK, Adjutant-General.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 21, 1898.

So that gentlemen will see that during the war of the rebellion the regular forces numbered, the maximum average number was 23,000 men, when it was within the power of the Administration to call out 41,158. That, it seems to me, is an argument against increasing the Regular Army to 105,000 enlisted men.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct a statement I made a moment ago in regard to what the chairman of the committee said. His language was this:

Mr. HULL. The present law on the statute books of the United States places the Regular Army in the time of peace at 26,040, in round numbers. The present law on the statute books of the United States provides for an increase between a peace footing and a war footing, making, in round numbers, the Regular Army of about 48,000 men. Does the gentleman want us to bring in a bill providing that in time of war there shall be no increase in the Regular Army over what we have to-day?

So I was incorrect; the gentleman stated 48,000 men.

Mr. HULL. The statement between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself has answered anything on that question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the chairman of the committee explain the second section?

Mr. HULL. We have not got to that yet.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word in connection with this subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair promised to recognize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Speaker, yesterday it was stated by two or three gentlemen on this floor that in time of war, under existing law, the President had the right to enlist into the Regular Army men up to the number of 48,000. I heard that stated by two gentlemen who are members of the Committee on Military Affairs, one the chairman of the committee and the other the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin, Colonel GRIFFIN. Now, I have taken the floor here for the purpose of saying that if these gentlemen have deceived themselves in regard to this matter I do not want this House to be deceived.

November 7, 1877, Congress came together in special session, called by President Hayes, and the Committee on Military Affairs, of which I was then a member, reported a bill limiting the number of enlisted men in the Army to 25,000, and that bill was approved during the month of November, 1877, and became a law, and from that day to this there has been no law placed upon the statute books changing that limitation, until two or three weeks ago, when this Congress provided for two additional artillery regiments and authorized the President to enlist 1,610 men in those two regiments. Congress increased by that act specifically the number of enlisted men in the Army to 26,610, and that is the limit under the law to-day; and beyond that, in time of war or in time of peace, the President has no right to enlist one solitary soldier. [Applause.]

Now that these two distinguished gentlemen have deliberately made this statement upon the floor, I think they owe it to themselves, and they owe it to this House, to produce the statute that authorizes the President to increase the Army at his will in time of war even to 48,000, or else strike that statement out of the RECORD; because if it is true, we ought to know it, and if it is untrue, coming from that source, it ought to be corrected.

[Mr. WHEELER of Alabama addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. BARROWS. Mr. Speaker, the testimony of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] is very significant, and I think on this subject is certainly very valuable. He has been graduated from West Point; he has had experience in the Army, and he comes to us with his confidence in the volunteer soldier. We might extend that testimony a great deal. I believe, Mr. Speaker, in the general subject and purport of this bill, namely, in the necessity of a reorganization of the Regular Army on the three-battalion basis. Our present system is antiquated. It is just as much behind the age as the old muzzle loader is behind the breech-loading gun or the Sharp rifle is behind the Krag-Jorgensen gun.

There is no lack of testimony on that subject. But when we come to consider the bill in all its details as originally proposed, I say that it comes right into conflict with the National Guard. It brings us face to face with that difficulty. As a member of the Committee on the Militia, and as one who has served for fifteen years in the militia of Massachusetts, I have a great interest in that side of the question. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I have an interest in both sides of it. I have seen the Regular Army, and have been with it in two campaigns, though not a member of it, at least in such relation to it as to see its operations and record its history. I have great confidence in the men who come from West Point, our officers.

I have great confidence in the Army as a whole, not only those who graduate from our Military Academy, but those who have made their way up from the ranks. I have seen upon our frontier exigencies presented which would have baffled the greatest engineers of the Old World, but which have been easily solved by our own officers experienced in frontier life. So I have confidence in the Regular Army. But I should oppose, Mr. Speaker, any increase in the Regular Army which would take from the militia the function which it now enjoys of being the great bulwark of this nation in time of war.

I should oppose anything which would take from the militia the supreme responsibility of defending this country, of fulfilling the righteous edicts of this Congress, or answering the call of the President in the time of need. Because the militia of this country represents an essential principle upon which we stand—that we are a peaceful people and that we are not to be called into war unless in case of an exigency relating to our self-defense, our existence and obligations as a nation, or under some supreme call in the interests of humanity.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the gentleman who has just sat down has presented the right principle, namely, that we are to maintain the spirit, the morale, of the Army, not merely its physical constitution. We tried an experiment in New York, my native city, at the beginning of the war. We thought it might be a good thing to enlist men who were loafing about the streets, idlers, and, as some called them, "plug-uglies," in those days. We thought they might be good warriors. But at the battle of Bull Run they turned their backs and ran, and did not stop until they reached the city of New York, and a few days after the battle that city was full of them.

They had the physical constitution, but they did not have the moral qualifications of a soldier. Now, we have organized our militia in the State of Massachusetts into the three-battalion organization, and have developed not only the physical capacity, but the moral strength of that force. We have seen the power of personality felt all through the organization of companies and regiments until these men have been raised in efficiency to such a standard that in twenty-four hours they would be ready to go into the field, and, after their first baptism of blood, as the gentleman from Alabama has said, be equal to the best regulars. That was the history of Massachusetts in 1861, and it would be so to-day. We do not want the officers who have helped to train these men to be thrown out nor to have regiments disintegrated.

This bill, if carried out in its original intention, would absorb the militia or a large portion of it, I think, into the Army. Now, if we absorb anything, let us absorb the Army into the National Guard. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania has shown, during our last war the Army did not exceed in strength 25,000 men, and yet we know what was the tremendous strength of our National Guard. In its very existence we have security against hasty, unreasonable, wild aggression in times of excitement. It is our guard against rushing into war before we need to, and without pausing to consider its deep and serious consequences. And why is that? Because we know in time of war that if we have a just and righteous cause—and we should never act without it—that the men who will go will be those from our own hearths and homes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I ask that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended three minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BARROWS. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to emphasize this point, that the National Guard is not only a defense in time of war, but a defense against rushing into any unholy war. We know that the men that make up the membership of the National Guard are those taken from our own homes. You can go into Massachusetts homes to-day, as you can go into many houses throughout the country, and find there the picture that is still tenderly draped and lovingly regarded of some dear one who gave his life in the hour of his country's need.

Our people know the cost of war when it comes to them. If we assume that the Regular Army must be filled up simply from pauper institutions, from criminal institutions, or from those who have recently come to this country and are not closely identified with our homes or institutions, but are men looking about merely for a job, then we should know but a small part of the sad realities of war. But when it comes to taking them from our own homes, from those who are near and dear to us, then we know something of what war means, and we shall pause before entering into it without some most holy and sacred cause. We want a cause so sacred that we shall be willing to give to it the most sacred lives; that we shall be willing to send nothing less than the best, the very flower of our manhood.

The great glory of our National Guard is that it is not an army of professional soldiers. It is simply the people organized, not for aggression, but to maintain order and to fulfill their own righteous decrees. At the voice of our governor, through our adjutant-general, the militia of Massachusetts could be mobilized in twenty-four hours, and what is still more satisfactory, by the same voice and in the same time it could be dismissed and not a trace of a soldier remain. It is the citizen, not the soldier, who is supreme; but the soldier is tenfold a better soldier because he is a faithful citizen.

Mr. Speaker, there is not a private in the militia who does not stand in precisely the same relation as the President of the United States in this respect. He is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, he is also the head of our diplomatic department, he is the citizen in chief, but when in a righteous cause and with the authorization of this Congress he lays down his pen to take up his sword, then every member of our National Guard will be ready to leave shop, bench, or field to follow him. We shall not go unfalteringly unless we have a just and holy cause, or unless at the summons of the highest sentiments of philanthropy to fulfill our duty to humanity.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that I shall stand by the National Guard as our safety for defense in war, and our safe defense against inviting the horrors of war in time of peace, for we must act as citizens before we act as soldiers.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman that this bill has nothing to do with the National Guard. I would like to ask him if he is not in favor of having the Regular Army organized equally as well as the National Guard?

Mr. BARROWS. I am. I will say that our organization in Massachusetts is a better organization than the Regular Army.

Mr. HULL. Exactly. And do you not think that the Regular Army ought to be as well organized as the National Guard?

Mr. BARROWS. I think it ought to be, and if that is all the gentleman contends for I shall be happy indeed to vote for this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have unanimous consent for twenty minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks that his time be extended to twenty minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the National Guard of Ohio, I am obliged to oppose the bill or any amendment or modification of the bill or the bill in its original form that will or might in any way increase the standing Army.

One of the officers of the Army—a colonel—in an interview given in the Ohio State Journal, of the city of Columbus, on Monday, the 4th instant, said that this bill would increase the Army to 104,000 men, and, among other things, he said that it would require but few of the State militia in case of war. He said that if that were done, there would be no need of their services; that "perhaps a few regiments from New York, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts would be called upon to man coast defenses, but the regiments in the Middle and Western States would not be called upon at all." When that appeared in the local paper, one of the most active and most intelligent members of the Ohio National Guard, Mr. H. P. Ward, immediately sent it to me with this comment and criticism: That they most "emphatically disapproved of the remarks of the colonel," and further said, "The organized militia of the land want to help in this affair, and do not like such snubbing."

I myself am inclined to think that the most important part of our equipment for war is the State militia, and I have been more and more impressed with that as I have heard some of the old ex-soldiers on the floor of this House explain the details of the requirements of a good army. It does seem to me that men without any military experience applying their knowledge acquired in other affairs to the State militia would readily understand that everything needs organization; that every movement, whether it be a society movement or a church movement or a military movement, requires leaders.

And if this measure to increase the Army does not increase it by looking to some encouragement for the officers of State militia, you would find hereafter that no man would assume the responsibility of wasting his time and energy for ten or fifteen years in the National Guard as a leader to inspire the subordinate men if he had no hope of reward, and no hope of honor, and no hope of distinguishing himself as a leader of these men in the future in a place of command among the national forces. The leaven is just as necessary in the bread as the flour is, and I say that the officers of the National Guard, their influence and their inspiration, are really the leaven of the whole military organization of the State.

Now, as far as the three-battalion system and method of reorganization is concerned, it seems to me it ought not to require much discussion on the floor of the House, although I understand that some able and distinguished gentlemen are opposed to the three-battalion system. I have been told by military officers that we have absolutely the most inferior plan of organization in the Regular Army of any of the great civilized nations; that our system is only to be compared with Persia and China and Spain, and not at all to be compared with that of England, France, Germany, Austria, or Russia.

It seems to me, however much we may discuss this measure, that really the only thing that is necessary at this time is to provide for the reorganization of the Army upon the method or system of three battalions. And further than that we certainly ought not to go. There is nothing confronting the country at this time that suggests any necessity for it. We have appropriated $50,000,000 and placed it as an emergency fund at the discretion of the President of the United States. If the men in the different States who are members of the National Guard should not tender their services promptly enough when we need them, there will be time enough for us in a single afternoon here, by the methods we have been using in legislation, to provide for a rapid and immediate increase for temporary purposes.

Mr. TALBERT. If the gentleman will permit an interruption, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. LENTZ. Certainly.

Mr. TALBERT. In what way would the bill, if it became operative, prevent the National Guard of any State from offering its services? Does the bill prevent them; and if so, in what way?

Mr. LENTZ. I will say in answer to the question of the gentleman——

Mr. TALBERT (continuing). For I am opposed to the bill myself, as I understand the gentleman to be.

Mr. LENTZ. The National Guard of Ohio is radically, distinctly, and diametrically opposed to the passage of the bill, for they feel that the men who have for many years maintained that organization are the men who will be subordinated and ignored if this bill becomes a law.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman will permit me, is not the proposition to which the gentleman refers respecting the National Guard and the other features proposed to be eliminated from the bill altogether leaving only the reorganization feature? My understanding of the opinions and views of the National Guard of the States of Illinois, Ohio, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Indiana is that they favor the three-battalion system, as proposed here, but not an expansion of the company system.

Mr. LENTZ. I agree with the gentleman as to that——

Mr. TALBERT. Would it not be well for the militia of each State to remain in the State for State defense?

Mr. LENTZ. No; for the very best reason, and that is that the best organized men ought to be permitted to come to the coast for coast defense if any men are needed at all.

Mr. TALBERT. But if the bill becomes operative, could they not do that anyhow?

Mr. LENTZ. Yes; but they are ambitious, not for the Regular Army to be increased, but that their own officers should come to the front together with them, the men who have trained with them, drilled with them, who have mingled with them for years, men from the same localities and neighborhoods, and it seems to me that we ought to encourage the State organizations in that regard.

The experience in Ohio is that the officers of the State militia have been used only in riots mainly in the mines, along railways, and such as occurred in Cincinnati a few years ago which resulted in the burning of the court-house, and they are reluctant to fire into bodies of men who may be their own relatives. But they are anxious and seek an opportunity to come to the front now and not to wait until next Monday; but to move to-night if necessary for the defense of the nation's honor, if we had the courage to simply declare the independence of Cuba, and they would be ready to put down any exhibition of resentment because of that declaration. There is no necessity, under the circumstances, for providing taxation to secure guns and uniforms for the Army if they are not to be used.

I think after this bill is amended as is proposed by the gentleman from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. HULL], it would probably be in such shape as it should be. But there is no necessity for increasing the Army at this time. All the circumstances in the case indicate that there will be no war with Spain. Yesterday we had this House filled, almost, I think, every seat being occupied by the various members, the galleries full to overflowing, and the Capitol grounds covered with people expecting a message from the President of the United States which might lead eventually to a declaration of war. But finally in the afternoon word came that some kind of a message had been sent from Havana by Consul-General Lee, indicating that he wants time, and the message is to be delayed on that account. Now, I do not believe that anybody had any authority for the statement from the Administration or any officer connected with it that justified the rumor which prevailed in the House on yesterday.

I find in the Evening Star of this city on yesterday, which I believe speaks on behalf of the Administration, a telegram from the Associated Press dated Havana, April 6, which says:

HAVANA, April 6.

The Government deserves great credit for the fact that in a time of national excitement the best of order is preserved in Havana. The streets are as quiet as the most exacting could ask, while the ordinary avocations are pursued without break or molestation.

It is safe to say that Havana at this hour is far quieter than Washington, New York, or Chicago. Of course, many business men have made their preparations to suspend trading until times are quieter and the vexed questions are settled.

Not only that, Mr. Speaker—not only does the Star use these words, but this morning, in the New York Journal, I find a dispatch dated Havana, April 6, at 6 p. m., using this language:

The attitude of the public is one of quiet expectancy. The order maintained in the city is admirable.

Consul-General Lee assures the correspondent of the Associated Press that he has received no instructions to leave Havana.

And this morning the Washington Post of this city says:

The attitude of the public is one of quiet expectancy. The order maintained in the city is admirable.

Consul-General Lee assures the correspondent of the Associated Press that he has received no instructions to leave Havana.

* * * * * * *

The Fern, Bache, and Mangrove are still in the harbor, with no orders, and with no indications of leaving for the north.

What, then, are we to expect or what to believe? If the Associated Press and the dispatches that appear in these papers tell the truth, then there is nothing to justify the statement sent to the Capitol on yesterday. I say, my friends, there will be no war.

I say that the influences in New York wired over to Boston, wired from Boston out to the Western cities, wired from the Western cities back here under the name of "the peace party," which simply means the speculating party in stocks and bonds—a new name and disguise—demonstrate to us that there will be no war. We need not hasten this bill. Let us take time to deliberate upon it and reorganize the Army according to the best intelligence of the day.

I find in the Ohio State Journal of Tuesday morning a statement headed, "McKinley's policy," and which I read, as follows:

M'KINLEY'S POLICY—INDORSED BY BUSINESS MEN OF COLUMBUS—MESSAGE SENT TO CONGRESSMAN LENTZ ASKING THAT HE SUPPORT THE PRESIDENT.

President McKinley's policy in regard to the impending crisis with Spain was indorsed Monday by a number of the leading business men and firms of Columbus. The occasion of this expression of confidence was the receipt of the following telegram from Boston:

DAGES, ANDREWS & Co., Columbus, Ohio.

GENTLEMEN: If you believe in President's firm, wise policy, telegraph your Senators and Congressmen to-day to support him; urge friends and customers to do the same. Leading concerns throughout the country are doing this.

H. B. ENDICOTT.

The matter was quickly taken up and the following message was sent Congressman JOHN J. LENTZ:

JOHN J. LENTZ, Washington, D. C.:

We feel confident that the President's policy on the Spanish question is wise and patriotic and recommend that you support him.

Dages, Andrews & Co.; Tracy-Wells Company; E. E. Shedd & Sons; Samuel Stevens & Co.; Smith Bros. Hardware Company; Orr, Brown & Price; Belknap, Carpenter & Co.; Green, Joyce & Co.; Ulrick & Cless; D. S. Ambach & Co.; Kauffman-Lattimer Company; Monypeny-Hammond Company; Bancroft, Sheldon & Co.; Samuel Butler & Co.; Fred Lazarus; E. B. Gager; J. C. Campbell; H. C. Pirrung; William Scarlett; W. F. Kelley; Harry B. Arnold.

On receiving that telegram, I answered it as follows, my answer appearing in the Cincinnati Enquirer of Tuesday morning:

DAGES, ANDREWS & Co. AND OTHERS, Columbus, Ohio:

Please advise me what the President's policy on the Spanish question is, and how did you find it out? Many of us Congressmen and Senators, ever since the assassination of 266 Americans, have been and still are earnestly trying to diagnose the President's policy. Will he take the stars off the flag and substitute dollar marks in their place? Will he tear off the stripes and put ribbons from the stock ticker in their place? How does it happen that your telegram is like that coming to other Congressmen from other cities at this very hour? I have supported the President up to this hour for everything asked. But I can not blindly follow unless I know that he intends to uphold the national flag and preserve the national honor.

JOHN J. LENTZ.

Upon the receipt of that telegram and its publication through Ohio, the Columbus Evening Dispatch, an Administration paper, said:

Let Mr. LENTZ come down a peg.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is not an Administration paper.

Mr. LENTZ. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] says it is not an Administration paper. I know that all through the campaign that I made this paper denounced me as not upholding the national flag, denounced me as determined to prevent the preservation of the national honor. I think it has been one of the most loyal and effective Administration organs in the State of Ohio in the last two years.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will my friend listen to me a moment? Is not that paper an independent paper, belonging to no party and following no party organization?

Mr. LENTZ. I am satisfied that it is independent of ever giving the Chicago platform a single fair word in any instance or in any paragraph.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is merely in the same fix that my friend was in at one time.

Mr. LENTZ. I do not think it is independent of the Administration or the Administration party. This paper goes on and says:

It is a remarkable reply for a Representative in Congress to make to his constituents.

The insinuation that the request sent to him was the result of some pressure brought to bear upon these merchants is not only small, but is an insult to them. It is wholly immaterial where the suggestion came from, or whether there was a suggestion. The request was the voluntary act of these business men, who are simply anxious for peace with honor, as all truly patriotic and truly sensible men are.

The Columbus Press-Post of Tuesday evening gives the following information as to how that telegram was prepared in my city. The headline is, "Hurrah for LENTZ and FORAKER!" Let me say I am willing to stand by Mr. FORAKER in his policy on the Cuban question from beginning to end; and ninety-nine out of a hundred "Buckeyes" will stand with Senator FORAKER on that proposition.

A MEMBER. "What is the matter with HANNA" on that proposition?

Mr. LENTZ (reading)—

"Stand by the President!" "Stand by the President!" This is the language of the telegrams now pouring upon Senators and Congressmen, inspired by the "peace bureau" run by MARCUS ALONZO HANNA, John J. McCook, Wall street, and President McKinley.

Such a telegram was sent to Hon. JOHN J. LENTZ, Congressman from this district, signed by names which, it is understood, were obtained by telephone, many of the signers never having seen the dispatch they were requested to indorse.

Such a telegram as that never could or would come from my constituents. I have received many telegrams and letters in behalf of Cuba from my constituents, and every one of them shows that it came direct from the heart and brain of the man who sent it—not a shoddy telegram made from the old clothes of some Eastern speculator. Telegrams are now coming to us on the Cuban question dictated by the commercial greed and instinct of this country! Telegrams dictated by greed when there is a great question of national honor at stake! Telegrams dictated by greed to control the financial policy of this country! Telegrams dictated by greed to control the tariff question of the country! Telegrams all beginning in Wall street! It seems to be the intention of these men to govern the United States from New York, just as England is governed from London. I say that there is an empire west of the Alleghany Mountains that will thwart that infernal purpose. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

My friends, you remember the Baring failure. Stocks came down all along the line. Having been on the farm in an earlier day, I have seen wheat in a bin. I have seen them open a hole in the middle of the bin and the wheat run down. That in the center went down faster, but to the very edges of the bin the whole body of the wheat sank gradually to that one hole in the center. These stock gamblers in New York and in London know that if we should recognize the independence of Cuba this afternoon, to-morrow the Spanish securities would be at the center of the wheat bin, sinking clear out of sight and down to the earth.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENTZ. I should like to have ten minutes more, if you please.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks that his time be extended ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LACEY. Is the gentleman going to speak about the bill or the wheat pit?

Mr. BRUCKER. He has obtained his consent, anyhow.

Mr. LENTZ. I want to say, with reference to the wheat illustration, that the same thing is true of the stocks and bonds in the stock granary or the bond granary. When one great stock sinks rapidly, when you have a Baring house failure or when you have a Spanish house failure, it does not simply mean the falling of Spanish stocks and securities, but it means a sympathetic fall of all the stocks and bonds in which the gambling speculators are dealing in Lombard street and Wall street, and it is not merely the Spanish question, but it is the old question of greed; it is again the question of plutocracy against democracy. It is the old question of the almighty dollar in this country that is destroying the manhood and the independence of it.

I say that the center for this telegram that was sent to me, and for all the telegrams of that kind, is not even Wall street, but Lombard street. I want to say, my friends, that it is a sympathetic fall in the other stocks that these gentlemen who control the Administration fear more than they fear war. They care nothing for the 266 assassinated Americans who went to the bottom of Havana Harbor, but they care everything for 99 cents plus 1 cent.

I say, my friends, that we owe an apology to Judas Iscariot. I say that he ought to be brought back and deified. If Judas Iscariot lived in this age he would not have gone to the potter's field and hanged himself. He would have been sent to the United States Senate in due time, such a speculator as he was. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] The mistake he made was that he came on earth about nineteen hundred years too soon. What a splendid opportunity there would be for him now to get into the Senate from the State of New York.

Mr. FOOTE. Oh, no.

Mr. HANDY. What about Ohio?

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope the gentleman will take that back about New York.

Mr. LENTZ. You ask me what about Ohio. I do not want to get personal. I was told the other day that over in the Senate they bow the head twice now, once when the Chaplain offers prayer and once when a certain gentleman from Ohio enters. Once they bow in reverence, and the next time they bow in shame. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FOOTE. The gentleman's apology is accepted.

Mr. LENTZ. I want to say that this business yesterday, my friends, has been properly characterized and represented in these words of the New York Journal. [Cries of "Oh!" on the Republican side.] Let me read from the New York Journal:

At the same time agents of the Administration spread reports in Washington that riots had already broken out in Havana.

These reports are absolutely false.

There have been no riots in Havana. The Americans there are not in more danger than usual.

I have proven that by what I have already read; but I quote again from the New York Journal:

The President and his Wall street Cabinet spread these reports as a subterfuge.

Wall street houses knew, two hours in advance of all others, that the message was not to go in to-day, and the President's money-making friends made fortunes, as they have been making them for the past week.

The state of affairs at Washington is the most scandalous in the history of the country.

I now read from the New York World of this morning, which says:

Delay helped stock jobbers. Wall street insiders made the usual dividend on "war postponed." They had news in advance.

* * * * * * *

The following table shows how the President's policy bulled the market yesterday:

	Tuesday's closing.	Wednesday's—
		Opening.	Closing.
American Sugar	116⅛	115⅞	119⅛
Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe, preferred	25½	25¼	26¼
Chicago, Burlington and Quincy	91⅛	91	94
Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul	89½	88¾	90¼
Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific	85½	85½	86½
Louisville and Nashville	49⅜	48⅝	51¼
Manhattan	96⅛	96	98⅜
Metropolitan Street Railway	138½	137½	140
Missouri Pacific	26⅜	26	27½
New York Central	110½	109½	111½
Northern Pacific	61½	61	63
Union Pacific, preferred	52⅜	51½	53⅜
Western Union	86½	86	86⅛

You see, there was a sympathetic rise in stocks because Spanish securities were held up another day.

Are we going to speculate each day until next Monday? I say to you that all you have got to do is to read the stock exchange reports to know what governs this Administration in this hour when the honor of this nation and the glory of our flag is being dragged in the gutters of greed and selfishness.

Mr. RICHARDSON. How could they know it two hours before we did?

Mr. LENTZ. I do not know how they could know it.

Mr. STEELE. They did not know it.

Mr. LENTZ. But everybody knows that here is circumstantial evidence that they did know it.

Mr. QUIGG. You do not know that they did.

Mr. LENTZ. I accept that as against the gentleman from New York. Anybody can confirm the statement by reading the stock report in yesterday's New York Evening Post. Not only that, a gentleman of my city, Hon. John L. Trauger, wired me yesterday afternoon, after the message had been delayed, and asked me what I thought about it. I answered him as follows:

President's message withheld. He seems opposed to free Cuba and free silver except by international agreement, and until such an agreement can be obtained the existing gold standard and Spanish policy of tyranny over Cubans and assassination of Americans must be preserved.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

In 1896 the Republican party at St. Louis said in its plank on foreign relations:

Our foreign policy should be at all times firm, vigorous, and dignified.

Has it been firm, vigorous, or dignified? And now we have these foreign powers intervening. I have not read it, but some one has just handed me the statement that a number of the foreign governments, through their representatives in this city, have carried a message to the President asking for delay.

Mr. QUIGG. It is just about as true as the first thing the gentleman stated.

Mr. LENTZ. I say it has just been handed to me. It is in this evening's Times, from which I read the following:

THE JOINT NOTE.

The undersigned, representatives of Germany, Austria-Hungary, France, Great Britain, Italy, and Russia, duly authorized in that behalf, addressed, in the name of their respective governments, a pressing appeal to the feelings of humanity and moderation of the President and the American people in their existing differences with Spain.

We have no existing differences with Spain. We have 266 assassinated Americans, and if we have any American manhood left we will use it first in recognizing the independence of Cuba, and in due time in avenging this injury and outrage to 266 of us, which should be the sacred concern of all the 75,000,000 of Americans. [Loud applause on the Democratic side and in the galleries.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The galleries will refrain from any manifestations of approval or disapproval of the proceedings on the floor of the House.

Mr. LENTZ. It was Talleyrand who said "language was invented to conceal thought." The explanation given yesterday why this Congress did not receive a message was because Mr. Lee in Cuba asked for delay. Was that an invention to conceal thought? The real thought back of that delay was that the stocks might be held up.

Ever since March, 1897, this Administration has been doing something endeavoring to raise the price of stocks, and every effort has been to bull the market and parade the quotations as an evidence of prosperity. And these very men, dictators to the Administration, are now with their shoulders under the market trying to hold it up; and if we declare for the independence of Cuba, Spanish securities will go down and other stocks upon the market will go down in sympathy; and the people who are bulling the market on Wall street realize to-day that if we recognize the independence of Cuba, the bears will have their innings. That is the secret of the Administration's policy of wabbling and delay this day and this hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENTZ. I would like to have a few minutes more.

Mr. QUIGG and others. I object.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I object, unless——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made by several gentlemen.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LENTZ. I want to say to the gentlemen on the other side I would like leave to continue my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. QUIGG. Regular order!

Mr. LENTZ. I would like leave to continue my remarks. I want to insert what I proposed to say if objection had not been made.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope there will be no objection. The gentleman can not publish anything worse than he has already said, and I hope he may have the privilege.

A MEMBER. I object.

Mr. LENTZ. I thank the gentleman from Ohio for that courtesy.

Mr. QUIGG. I demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Who objects?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York objected, and the House will be in order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ], my distinguished colleague, has predicated a long speech of a full half hour upon a statement of facts made by himself, and for which he binds himself as a representative of the people. Standing in his own place he declares that no message came from General Lee yesterday; that it was a "fake" report; that it was false, and that it was given out for the corrupt purpose by the President of the United States to affect the stock market.

I answer that statement by saying that each and every part of that statement is, without qualification, absolutely without foundation in truth. [Applause on the Republican side.] I call upon the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY], a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, to say whether I tell the truth or not when I say that such a dispatch was received from General Lee and was read by the Hon. ALBERT S. BERRY, of Kentucky. There is the answer, and that is the character of the assaults that are being made on American honor and the integrity of the President of the United States.

Not only did the dispatch come on yesterday, but it came the day before, and appealed to the President of the United States. I read the telegram, and there are more than twenty men on this floor and in the Senate now who read the telegram, both Democrats and Republicans. It was read to the distinguished members of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, and each and every one of them, without qualification, coincided with the policy of the President not to send the message to Congress at that time. I say again that on yesterday a most earnest and urgent protest came from General Lee. Is General Lee at one "end of the ticker"? [Laughter on the Republican side.] Some men can ascribe corrupt motives to other men. How they ever became educated to the idea that all men are corrupt I leave to your imagination.

Mr. LENTZ. I am not reflecting against General Lee, and said nothing about General Lee——

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman has had a full half hour time——

Mr. LENTZ. If you knew this day before yesterday, why did you let the House and galleries fill up with people and sit here and say nothing about it while Wall street was speculating upon it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Wall street was not speculating upon it. That story is as false as the other. It is absolutely untrue. How could I keep the people from coming here? That is not all of it. I say to the gentleman that the President intended to disregard, hoping for the best, the first mild suggestion from General Lee, and had his message signed and sealed and ready to be transmitted to both Houses, and yesterday morning when the final protest in the name of humanity came, as I have said, it was read before the two committees of the two Houses, and without a dissenting voice they advised the President against sending it here.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I wish the gentleman from Kansas would let me have the floor just once without interrupting me. I do not want to be bothered. Just as soon as I get the floor, the gentleman at once comes running in with his interruptions to my speech, and I have got tired of it.

Now, let me answer another proposition made by the gentleman from Ohio. He has made a garbled statement here. He made a statement that the representatives of the great powers in this city have to-day called on the President and asked him "to delay."

I stated that that was not true. I have the statement here in my hand and there is not one word said about "delay." What the gentleman did not read is the response it is said the President made—I know nothing about it—in which he put an end, without qualification, to all suggestions of delay or interference of any kind whatever. Now, the gentleman is arraigning the President of the United States. He is sending a message to the enemy showing them that here in the midst of this House of Representatives is a man who will charge the President of the United States with a corrupt purpose, with a corrupt intention, with attempting to stop the progress of the great march of patriotism.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended fifteen minutes.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky objects.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ] can have the privilege of publishing his remarks in the RECORD, I will withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky objects.

Several members addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order. Gentlemen will take their seats.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Kentucky——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All gentlemen will be seated and the House will be in order.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask that the objection to the extension of time be withdrawn, inasmuch as the gentleman did grant me the courtesy of extending my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will put the request again. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from Ohio be extended fifteen minutes.

Mr. HANDY. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HARTMAN. Is a motion in order to extend the gentleman's time for twenty minutes?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not. The gentleman from Delaware [Mr. HANDY] has demanded the regular order.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by the committee, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 2. That in time of war the President, in his discretion, may establish a third battalion for each infantry regiment, consisting of four companies, to be supplied by manning the two skeleton companies, and by organizing two additional companies. The vacancies of commissioned officers in the additional companies shall be filled by promotions by seniority in the infantry arm, and by appointments in accordance with existing law.

The amendment offered by the committee was read, as follows:

On page 1, section 2, line 13, after the word "that," strike out the words "in time of war" and insert the words "upon a declaration of war by Congress, or a declaration by Congress that war exists."

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, never since I have had the honor to be a member of this House have I objected to an extension of time for any man, and certainly I never engaged in a friendly debate with a colleague on this floor and then sought to shut his mouth by an objection.

Mr. LENTZ. I hope the gentleman does not mean by that remark to reflect on me.

Mr. GROSVENOR. My friend has done all that was fair in the matter.

Mr. LENTZ. I have been anxious that my colleague the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] should have all the time he desired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want but fifteen minutes.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] asks that the gentleman from Ohio may be allowed to proceed for fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LENTZ. And I hope he may be allowed additional time, if he desires.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is all the time I want.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I wish to say that my objection to permitting the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] to proceed was based upon this fact: The request had been made that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ] be allowed to extend his remarks in the RECORD, and objection was made by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CUMMINGS. "Two wrongs do not make a right."

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I stated that if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ] were permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD, as it is customary to permit members to do, I would withdraw my objection. I desire now to amend the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] by adding the provision that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ] be allowed to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman from Kentucky will allow me to proceed, there is going to be no trouble. His friends and my friends will be generously treated, and the gentleman from Kentucky need not be concerned about that. There is no need of either "armed intervention" or any "declaration of independence" on this question.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ] has not been generously treated. The gentleman from New York has objected to allowing the gentleman from Ohio to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. GROSVENOR. When my colleague [Mr. LENTZ], after occupying the floor for some time, asked an extension, I personally appealed to members that there should be no objection.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I wish to say to the gentleman from Ohio——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why punish me over some other man's head?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I dislike to visit my displeasure upon the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] be allowed fifteen minutes?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the Chair state the request coupled with my request—that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ] be allowed to extend his remarks?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does the gentleman from Kentucky make a condition of that character between gentlemen? Would he bring this arrangement down to the level of a horse trade?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Well, let the matter go.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. I wish to say that my objection to the extension of the time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] was based on the same ground as has been stated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. GROSVENOR. With the warm temper of our debates it sometimes happens that gentlemen are not as courteous as they ought to be; but ordinarily you can count on the House doing the fair thing by everybody.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I was interrupted in my remarks at a point which is important for me to recur to for a moment.

I was proceeding to call the attention of the House to the fact that the gentleman from Ohio, my colleague [Mr. LENTZ], had pointed his argument with a statement, made, I assume, by his own mistake in the heat of debate, that the appeal of these ambassadors was for delay on our side. Now, let me say in response to the gentleman that there is no word of delay in all the language which has been used in this connection, and the injustice, I think, of the gentleman's argument was in seeking to get some ground against the President for the declaration of the ambassadors, while he failed to give to the public in the course of his remarks what the President stated in reply.

Now, here is what the President said, among other things:

The Government of the United States appreciates the humanitarian and disinterested character of the communication now made on behalf of the powers named, and for its part is confident that equal appreciation will be shown for its own earnest and unselfish endeavors to fulfill a duty to humanity by ending a situation the indefinite prolongation of which has become insufferable.

I am assuming that this is a true statement of the facts. It is published in the Times. As I understood the gentleman from Ohio to state, this is the Administration organ. God help the Administration if so. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The Government of the United States—

Says he—appreciates the cordiality and disinterested character of the communication.

That is what he said. Is there anything about "halting" or calling "time" or "delay" in that?

Now let me say again to the gentleman from Ohio that the only newspaper in Washington that published the statement that there was trouble in Havana on yesterday was the Daily Times; and yet the gentleman said it was published in an "Administration paper."

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Has the gentleman read the response of the President? Will he please give the House what the policy of the President is to be, in accordance with that suggestion?

Mr. MAHON. To drive the Spanish from Cuba.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Nobody knows better than the gentleman from Tennessee knows that such a question as that is an improper one; and I think I can probably answer it by asking if the gentleman is in possession of information about what the "controlling powers" on his side of the House will be doing next Monday? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. McMILLIN. I can say to the gentlemen from Ohio that I know one thing, that the controlling power on his side of the House is Mr. HANNA. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, well, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman from Ohio will permit me to say it, there have been no seceders on this side of the Hall; no men holding caucuses for the last week or two, as they have been doing on the other side of the Hall. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, let us see whether there has been any such action or not. I think I remember an occasion, not forty-eight hours old, when a certain gentleman most vigorously and violently made an onslaught, on constitutional grounds, on a war measure brought forward by the Republicans, and I think I remember to have seen the gentleman from Missouri, the gentleman from Texas, and one from Tennessee break their ranks, and the gentleman took water quicker than a dog overcome with heat rushes to water. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BAILEY. I think, as the gentleman from Ohio has set the example of denouncing statements as false upon this floor, I will take occasion to denounce that statement as absolutely false.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, we will see about that. It is not a matter that is hidden. It is a matter of record. There is no question about it. It is in the RECORD and will show for itself.

Mr. LENTZ. I have been told on this side that in the confusion I overlooked the fact that the gentleman had said that I said no telegram had been received from Consul-General Lee and that I said the Washington Times was an Administration organ.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. LENTZ. I did not say either, and I refer the gentleman to the notes of my speech. I said that a marked copy of the Times had just been handed to me by one of my associates. I did not even have time to comment on that article. I said the Columbus Evening Dispatch was an Administration organ, and the Ohio State Journal has been a Republican organ almost since its foundation—that is, ever since there was a Republican party.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think I will go on, if the gentleman has got through with that catalogue of newspapers. What the gentleman did say was this—and I may have made a mistake, and if I did, I am glad to call his attention to it—he said that within a very short time after the notice reached us yesterday that the message would not come, it was published in an Administration organ in this town that there was a riot at Havana.

Mr. LENTZ. I deny that I said anything of the kind, and you can not find it in the notes, either.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, I so understood it; and if I have done the gentleman an injustice——

Mr. LENTZ. I said we were here up to 3 o'clock expecting a message while they were speculating in Wall street on the fact that no message would come.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But, further than that, you said that in justification of that, as I understood you, an Administration organ published the statement——

Mr. LENTZ. I said that yesterday evening's Star contained a certain article, which I read verbatim.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, that was not that part of your speech.

Mr. LENTZ. That paper, I said, was one of the Administration organs.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If I have done the gentleman an injustice in that respect, I shall see to it that reparation is made in the RECORD.

A MEMBER. Make it now.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But I think the gentleman will find that he will have to make the reparation, and not myself, because there was no publication of that character in the Star of yesterday, none whatever, and surely the gentleman did state that it was being published here that there were no riots in Havana.

Now, I call the attention of the gentleman and of the House to the statement that the gentleman made, that this was another stock-jobbing performance, and that here was another purpose of delay in this declaration of the ambassadors of the great powers, so that Wall street would run upward. I hold in my hand the statement that immediately upon the publication of this statement in the city of New York, the market became very weak and ran clear down upon every one of the leading articles in the market. See how easy it is to make a charge.

Now, let me tell the gentleman something about bonds. It is very easy to charge a Senator—and how brave it is, how wonderfully brave for the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ] to call a Senator by name and abuse him and talk about bonds. That Senator has made a statement, which I challenge any man to deny, that never in his life—not only not this year, but never in his life—did he buy a dollar of stock in Wall street or anywhere else.

Mr. McMILLIN. Can he say the same thing about votes? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LENTZ. Now, if the gentleman will permit me to make another correction——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I believe I had better retain a part of this time—just a little of it.

Mr. LENTZ. Will the gentleman permit me to correct him again?

Mr. GROSVENOR. If I have made any misstatement.

Mr. LENTZ. I want to say that I made no statement about riots. I read that quotation from the New York Journal.

Mr. MAHON. That is a statement.

Mr. LENTZ. I mentioned no Senator from any State on the floor of this House. His name was mentioned in one of the articles I read.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Everybody knew—does the gentleman say he did not intend to point out MARK HANNA?

Mr. LENTZ. How could everybody know?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Did you intend it to mean MARK HANNA? Be brave now. Answer that. Did you mean MARK HANNA?

Mr. LENTZ. What makes you think I meant MARK HANNA? [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. You mentioned MARK HANNA, and the RECORD will show it.

Mr. LENTZ. I will charge you with the responsibility of accusing Mr. HANNA. I have not. I described a certain individual

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, but the gentleman did use the name I have been baiting him to say that.

Mr. LENTZ. I deny it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, there is the RECORD.

Mr. LENTZ. I appeal to the RECORD. Let us have the RECORD.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And everybody knows, and a gentleman sitting right by the gentleman said, "What about MARK HANNA?"

Mr. LENTZ. I am not responsible for what the whole House says.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What about the Senator from New York whom you assailed? What did you mean by that? I am pointing out the degradation of debate when members of the House of Representatives, for the purposes of their malice, call Senators by name upon this floor and discuss them.

Mr. LENTZ. I appeal to the Speaker. The gentleman asks me a question. He asks me what I meant about the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LENTZ. Wait a minute. I read in the paper this morning that J. P. Morgan had come back from Europe. That is the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is he a Senator?

Mr. LENTZ. No.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then the gentleman was trying to locate it where it did not belong.

Mr. LENTZ. Is Mr. HANNA a Senator from New York? He may be——

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; but I have got through with the Hanna part of it. I was pointing out how degraded men can get when driven by the exigencies of a political debate to stand up, in violation of the rules of this House, in violation of gentlemanly propriety, and denounce by name Senators of the United States, who can not reply. Now, Mr. Speaker, let us see how this situation stands. The gentleman is greatly worried about bonds, and he read the name of John J. McCook in one of his raids this afternoon.

Who is John J. McCook? Whom does he represent? What is he here for? How do he and the gentleman from Ohio stand with reference to this? I will show you that they are parties in a great conspiracy; one wittingly so, the other, I trust, ignorantly so. Who is John J. McCook? He is the legal representative of the Cuban Junta, of New York, behind which stands four hundred millions, more or less, of bonds that can be validated by the recognition of the independence of Cuba by the United States, and they will be destroyed by a policy that drives Spain out of Cuba in the interest of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. LENTZ. Was it not announced that this same J. J. McCook was to be a member of the present Cabinet?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have heard that the gentleman and myself were, each and both of us, to be governor of the State of Ohio, but we never got there. [Laughter.]

Mr. LENTZ. I am quite sure that you will never get there; I am not so sure about myself. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman changes his politics again as rapidly as he did about two years ago, God only knows where he will come in. [Great laughter on the Republican side.]

I will tell you who John J. McCook is. John J. McCook represents an interest running up into the hundreds of millions of dollars, and if he could get the United States to make a recognition of the independence of Cuba and then fight to establish it by the United States, at a cost of a thousand million dollars, the holders of these bogus bonds will realize $400,000,000 and collect the money. That is where the bonds come in.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks that his time be extended five minutes.

Mr. LENTZ. I ask that it be extended fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ] asks that the time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] be extended for fifteen minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let us take the other side. They are talking about bonds all the time. Let us take the other side. I was told some time ago, just before the time that this trouble broke out—I was told a party in the city of New York sold short on the market to an extent that in the condition that things were in prior to the breaking out of this Cuban trouble would have absolutely ruined him, although his estate is a very wealthy one.

I have been told that from that day to this any proposition to provoke Spain to war, any motion that would cause war in this country between Spain and the United States, has been promoted by that gentleman, because the moment war is declared the short side of the market will put a million dollars into his pocket. Now, would the gentleman tell us——

Several MEMBERS (on the Democratic side). Who is it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Tell us how anybody can be benefited by preventing war? How? I mean any stock broker; anybody who holds any stocks. How can that happen, when prices are going up or down as each battle progresses and as each ship has to surrender. Then is the time that stocks rise and stocks fall. And were I a stock gambler—which, thank God, I am not—there would be no occasion more gratifying to my greed than upon war with the United States and another country.

Now, the gentleman says there is going to be no war. He tells us how he knows it. He knows it because the money interest is opposed to it! I say to the gentleman that the strongest stand that has been taken for putting an end to this war has been taken by the men representing the greatest amount of money in the United States. Why? Men of vast means do not act foolishly very often.

Why is it that every manufacturer in the United States wants an end put to this war? Because they want things to get back again to where they were before this agitation began. Why is it that the Treasury of the United States wants to put an end to this uncertainty? Because the revenues of the Government are being destroyed by this excitement and uncertainty. Therefore it is that the President of the United States, backed by his Cabinet and backed by the best judgment of this House and backed by the best judgment of the Senate, is proceeding as rapidly as possible to put an end to this war; and yet the gentleman, who has nothing to go upon, says that the President has faltered.

He has not. The gentleman has no means of knowledge. He can not say that the President has faltered; and he has perfectly shielded himself and makes his entire argument upon his original statement—that there never had been any such telegram from General Lee, and the whole thing was sent out by the Administration in the interest of speculation.

That was the charge. A charge no more serious than that has brought the head of many a man to the block. A charge more infamous than that could not be borne by any man in this country—to make it appear that the President of the United States has used the power that Congress has given to him to operate upon the stock markets of this country. Prove that and you would have a vacancy in the Presidency just as quick as you can establish it. The charges have no truth.

Mr. LENTZ. I have already said to you that I deny that I said anything of the kind. I never said that a telegram had not been sent.

Mr. GROSVENOR. "The Administration set the story afloat in the interests of stock speculation." Those are your exact words, as the reporter's notes will show.

You made a charge that, if true, ought to condemn the President of the United States to impeachment and imprisonment; and there is no shadow or foundation for it except your statement that General Lee never sent a message begging, pleading of the President to withhold his message from Congress.

I for one have felt that it was a terrible assault upon the honor and integrity of Spain what we did on yesterday; but it must be remembered that there was put up, on the one hand, the choice of insult to Spain, solemnly delivered by the President of the United States, an intimation sent to the whole world that there was danger of murder to American representatives in Cuba, or there was put, on the other side, the danger itself. We can have no more tragedy along this line until war comes to put the whole thing into the hands of tragedy.

Mr. VANDIVER. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me an interruption? I think the gentleman is under a misapprehension. If I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ] correctly, he did not say that there was no telegram received from Consul-General Lee at that time, but he did say there was no riot in Cuba. [Cries of "Oh!" "Oh!" on the Republican side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, my friend, Mr. LENTZ will not say that. I think that after all the statements of denials are filed here, it will appear that the gentleman from Ohio did not make a speech at all, and therefore I propose to ask that he have liberty to print one in the RECORD. [Laughter.]

Now, then, I will say that over against the statement of the insult to Spain that was deliberately hurled at her by the American people, the Administration was compelled to put the chances of murder; not that the Government of Spain would do it, but the Government was so powerless to maintain order that the ships of a friendly nation are unsafe in her ports and might be overwhelmed by mobs and murder have taken place.

I will ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ], Suppose the message had gone to Congress yesterday, and suppose that last night the blood of that distinguished and chivalrous gentleman from Virginia had soaked the soil of Cuba, what would have been the verdict of the American people against the Administration? But the gentleman read from three or four newspapers to show that in point of fact there was not any riot in Havana last night.

Who said there was? That proposition of General Lee was that if the message went to Congress at 2 o'clock yesterday, there was danger. It did not go to Congress at 2 o'clock yesterday nor at any other time, and the gentleman says, "Now, I can prove there is nothing in this statement that there was danger, because nobody was killed last night." Is not that a beautiful argument? [Laughter.]

That is the argument proposed to condemn the Administration with. The Administration withheld its message from Congress upon the representation of General Lee that there was danger of trouble. There being no trouble, therefore the gentleman from Ohio said that that shows there was not any truth in the statement.

Mr. OGDEN. Will the gentleman state whether the Administration did not first telegraph General Lee, and General Lee respond to it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No, no; I will not answer that. If there is a man in the House so far forgetful of his dignity as an American citizen, of the humblest character, to intimate that the President of the United States has been guilty of juggling a thing like that, I will not answer it. But let us see what is involved in that insinuation. Let us see how the gentleman stands. God help the man who had you for an advocate. [Laughter.]

Mr. OGDEN. I made it because it was said that the telegram itself indicated that it was in reply to one from the Administration.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let us see how brief a statement will make you regret that you have done what you have. Is General Lee a puppet? Is he a liar? Is he a scoundrel? Is he a man that ought to be whipped from one end of the world to the other? You intimate that he sent a false dispatch at the suggestion of the President. That is where you put General Lee. Where does a man stand who can imagine it possible that that chivalrous gentleman was guilty of a crime like that—the man whom all the world honors to-day and to whom I pay homage?

Mr. OGDEN. My inquiry made in reference to that is not subject to any such inference.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me show the gentleman and he will see how plain it is. There was something in the telegram that General Lee sent on yesterday that indicated it was in answer to a telegram sent to him. I have already told the House that the day before General Lee had sent a telegram expressing fear that trouble might come.

Now, I have said that the Administration yesterday morning or late the night before inquired of General Lee if he did not think he could get along notwithstanding the message was sent to Congress, and in answer to that he sent another one stronger than the one first sent. Mr. Speaker, I did not suppose that in this American Congress it was necessary that I should make an explanation in order to defend the President of the United States from an insinuation like that or that the chivalrous gentleman from Virginia needed a defender on this floor.

Mr. OGDEN. I have made no insinuation. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Gentlemen, everything that has been said has been taken back. Now, if my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] will just take back one brief sentence that he said and one single word that he said, we shall have peace and recognition of independence. [Laughter.] There is nothing left now of all that has been said during the last hour except the remark of the gentleman who asked whether MARK HANNA had bought any votes, and who used the word "HANNA" once.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is one question the gentleman has never answered and can not answer except to the shame of his party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. MARK HANNA never bought any Republican votes. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. I am entirely willing that the reputation of the gentleman referred to should rest on what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has just confessed—that he has bought votes, but they were not Republican votes. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will proceed with my speech.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not had an opportunity to say a word during these five minutes. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I am delighted that my distinguished colleague [Mr. LENTZ] has taken occasion this afternoon to make this assault upon the Administration. I am glad that the purpose of the opposition is now fully and clearly disclosed. I am delighted that, because of a little change in the programme, wholly unimportant, except as it strengthens the daily augmenting power of the United States—a change made under stress of circumstances that would have controlled any civilized nation—I am delighted that the gentleman from Ohio has given us notice that every occurrence now and hereafter is to be taken advantage of for party purposes; and I am delighted that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has two or three times now, on each succeeding day, pointed out with great delight that there are differences of opinion on the Republican side of the House. I suggest to the gentleman that when he opens a recruiting office to get volunteers to pass under his banner to fight the Administration he had better make a contract for the rent of his quarters from day to day, as he will probably not need them very long in the future.

Here comes a matter which the whole world will say controlled the Administration as it ought to have been controlled; and the world will be notified to-night that the President of the United States has been assailed by a distinguished Representative on this floor, his motives impugned, his integrity censured, his whole action charged as being instigated by criminal purpose. And this in a body that boasts that it is going to stand by the Administration!

Now, gentlemen, let me tell you another thing. This war will be fought under the banner of the Republican Administration of this Government or it will never be fought at all. We may differ about how it ought to be inaugurated, and honestly. Some of you may have an opinion different from mine, and I honor you for that. But when the time comes the Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States will command the column that will crush the power of Spain, or it never will be crushed.

Again, you will discover as you go along that the enemy on the other side—the opposition—are putting forward matters of legal interest, taking a position to-day that they did not take two years ago. It is not yet two years since it was proclaimed by the great Democratic lawyers of the Congress of the United States that there was no power in the Congress of the United States to recognize the independence of a foreign country; labored arguments filled the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to show that such recognition was not within the power of Congress, but lay exclusively, under the Constitution, in the hands of the President.

But, however that may be, when war is declared the President of the United States becomes at once vested by the Constitution with the power to conclude treaties with foreign countries, and he is at all times the Commander in Chief of the Armies of the United States.

I have no more doubt that we are going to war than I have that we will live until next week. I may be mistaken. I pray to God that I may be mistaken. But I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we will go to war on a declaration substantially of Congress. My influence will be given for peace with honor, and for whatever it is worth. My influence will be given to avert war; but the time is up, in my humble judgment, when we can avert it; and if peace shall prevail, it must come from the action of another country rather than our own.

Our position is taken, and we can not recede. But let the policy of this Government be such that when the tocsin of war shall have sounded, all of the civilized world will say, "America is right." [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES. What is your position?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have already stated it fully.

To-day this Administration is being jeered at by some so-called friends at home. And yet the intelligent nations of the world this morning from every great capital of Europe have, by their direct announcement or by a silence more powerful than a mere statement, indorsed the course of the Administration and pointed out that we have been governed by the true principles and the proper spirit of international law. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio, in the course of his remarks, suggested that with one or two more withdrawals we would be in a position as if nothing had been said. In that statement the gentleman omitted to say, or else he did not remember, that one of the most important withdrawals is one that ought to have come from him. He made a statement with reference to an occurrence which took place in this Chamber only two days ago that if he did not know to be untrue, he ought to have known it, because the evidence of its falsity was in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD before him.

He declared that I started in on constitutional grounds to resist a measure, and that I was only swerved from my purpose after the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] had spoken upon the question; and yet the RECORD shows that in reply to an interruption of the gentleman himself I announced my intention and the intention of those on this side of the House to vote for the resolution before either the gentleman from Texas or the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] had taken the floor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Here is the proof. I hold in my hand the RECORD, and with that before him if he is not willing to make the admission that he misstated the facts and did me an injustice, then, Mr. Speaker, I do not care the thrip of my thumb and finger for any statement he may make, for he shows himself utterly regardless of the truth. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On page 3516, in the very third paragraph, I announced my intention and the intention of this side of the House to support the proposition; and yet the gentleman from Illinois who had the floor did not yield to either the gentleman from Missouri or the gentleman from Texas until page 3517 of the RECORD. And the gentleman ought not to have been mistaken, for he must have known the fact that I had a controversy with the gentleman from Illinois as to the manner in which he sought to use his time. When I concluded my statement, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] said:

> I believe I have the right to close, and as I want not more than two or three minutes, I will ask the gentleman to consume some more of his time.

Upon that statement I proceeded and consumed my time, and it was after I had consumed it that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] first yielded to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS]. I protested against it as an unfair advantage, and used these words at the conclusion of Mr. SAYERS'S speech:

> Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I do not consider it fair for the gentleman from Illinois to have left me under the impression that he did not intend to use his time, and then, after we had used all ours, undertake to use the balance and make the vicious attack upon me which he did a minute ago.

The gentleman from Illinois, following a habit that has become too frequent on that side, denied that he had made any such statement as that, and his denial follows here:

> Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman that I gave him no understanding that I would not use a part or all my time.

He said that in the very face of the fact that he had previously said he only intended to use two or three minutes, and asked me to use my time. I then said to the gentleman:

> When I concluded my statement you indicated that. I ask for the reporter's notes.
> Mr. CANNON. The notes will not show that, and I have the right to use the time.

Thus there was an issue of fact between the gentleman from Illinois and myself, on which issue of fact I was clearly right and supported by the RECORD; but in the face of that controversy and with the knowledge that I had announced my purpose to support that bill before either the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] or the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] had occupied the floor, the gentleman declared that I was driven to abandon my position by the indication of a revolt on this side.

But, Mr. Speaker, that is unimportant. However, since he has charged that the leaders on this side are driven by the fear of a revolt to abandon their position, I reply that even such conduct is better than that on the other side, where the followers, under the fear of the punishment of their leaders, are compelled to abandon their caucus determination. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask two or three minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks that his time be extended three minutes.

Several MEMBERS. Five.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am glad to know from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] that there has been a change in the programme, which he says is unimportant, though he does not favor the House with any statement of how important or unimportant the change is.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will allow me, it was the change in the programme of not sending the message yesterday but on a later day.

Mr. BAILEY. And is the message to be exactly what the gentleman intimated on last Thursday that it would be?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, I think it will be much stronger than I stated it would be, but I do not know anything about the President's message, and the gentleman knows—I think he knows—I do not know anything about it, and I know he knows that if I did I would not tell him. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman talks very much as though he did not know anything about it, but his relations with the President are so close and friendly, I presumed the President had taken him into his confidence; but I do not presume that the gentleman would violate that confidence by standing on the floor of the House and telling us all what the President was only willing to tell him.

On last Thursday, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] used these words:

> There is glory in the right direction. Cuba will be free, and Cuba will be free by the intervention of the United States.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is right. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is what I say to-day.

Mr. BAILEY. Wait. Let us see if you will applaud this when I finish:

> I would not give one cent for a declaration of independence unaccompanied by a further declaration. What nonsense it would be to declare the Island of Cuba independent and then let her starve to death!
> What sense would there be in declaring a nation independent that has not a gun-making shop, not a ship, has not a piece of artillery, so far as I know? The thing to do in the case of Cuba is to exhaust all that honest diplomacy can do to achieve her liberty and independence, and, failing in that, stop not at the halfway house that the gentleman from Texas is talking about—not only declare that Cuba is independent and shall be free, but accompany that declaration with an army and a navy to make our declaration worth something.

Now, if the gentleman speaks with authority for the Administration, the President's message, then, would have declared that Cuba is free and shall continue free. I hold in my hand what purports to be an interview with the gentleman from Ohio, an interview which appeared in the New York Herald only a day or two after that speech was delivered, which asserts a different policy:

> President McKinley's message to Congress may bring war, but it will not recommend it.
> This is as much as anyone can say to-night as to the general effect of the anxiously awaited document. The President's closest personal friends insist that they have no definite idea as to the specific recommendations the President will make. Representative GROSVENOR, who is usually regarded as the legislative spokesman of the President, says the President will make a strong, firm review of the Spanish-Cuban question; that his recommendations will be in the direction of the independence of Cuba, without involving a declaration of war.
> He says further that the President will make such a comprehensive review of the entire Cuban question, and such definite recommendations in the way of solving the great problem, that Congress can be depended upon to cooperate with him without making a declaration of war. The most that can be said as to this is that Congress will wait until Wednesday for the message.

On Thursday you were for independence followed by armed intervention; three days afterwards you were for independence without armed intervention; and to-day you are for armed intervention without independence. Here are three changes in almost as many days. Now, I ask the gentleman from Ohio, does that interview which appeared in the New York Herald on last Monday correctly represent him?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have never seen it, but I have heard the gentleman read it. Doubtless the substance is correct; and the three statements which the gentleman has referred to are all substantially in the same direction. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BAILEY. Upon that statement, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to go to the country; but we must go with the understanding that I repel the statement of the gentleman from Ohio that this is to be a Republican war. If it is war at all, it will be the war of the whole American people against Spanish oppression in the Island of Cuba. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Sir, when the brave volunteer goes to offer his services will you ask him if he be a Republican, a Populist, or a Democrat? Do you expect when he comes to tender his brave heart and young life a willing sacrifice upon the altars of his country that he shall demand to know whether the commander who leads him into battle be a Republican, a Populist, or a Democrat? In such a time such a question would be resented as an insult by a self-respecting American soldier. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that now that we have had both sides of this Cuban question debated very fully, we ought to go on and finish this bill.

Mr. LENTZ. I hope that the gentleman will allow me to correct the statement of the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa in charge of the bill was recognized.

Mr. LENTZ. I realize that; but I hope the gentleman will not proceed under his recognition. As courtesies have been extended, I hope they will not be on one side.

Mr. HULL. Both gentlemen from Ohio and the gentleman from Texas have debated this matter. Now, I give notice that in five minutes I shall move the previous question on this section.

Mr. LENTZ. Five minutes is not enough. The gentleman from Ohio quoted me, and I have asked for the reporters' notes. It will take a little more than five minutes. My friends here accorded an hour to the gentleman from Ohio, and I only had thirty minutes.

Mr. HULL. Make it ten minutes, then.

Mr. LENTZ. It is an easy thing to make a speech against a straw man that you set up for yourself and then knock him down. The speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] is one of much ado about nothing. He misquoted me in every instance, and did not dare to explain or try to explain why the recognition of Cuba's independence is delayed. I will ask the whole House to give some good reason why the independence of Cuba should not be recognized here and now; and there has not been anyone, neither when I asked it to-day nor last week, that dares to answer the question or try to answer it.

It does not necessarily mean war unless war is declared by Spain; and if so, let her do it. We want to be on the defensive in that fight. I defy the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] to give a reason, either speaking for the Administration or pretending to speak for the people, why we should not here and now recognize the independence of Cuba before we adjourn this evening. Answer it if you dare. What does it mean? Does it mean war? Not unless Spain declares it.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LENTZ. You can ask me questions in your own time. But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] makes charges against me as to certain things which he falsely accuses me of saying, and I propose to use my time in reading the notes of the stenographers to show what I did say. I now read from the notes handed me by the reporter, as follows:

> All the circumstances in the case indicate that there will be no war with Spain. Yesterday we had this House filled, almost, I think, every seat being occupied by the various members, the galleries full to overflowing, and the Capitol Grounds covered with people expecting a message from the President of the United States which might lead eventually to a declaration of war. But finally in the afternoon word came that some kind of a message had been sent from Havana by Consul-General Lee, indicating that he wants time, and the message is to be delayed on that account.
> Now, I do not believe that anybody had any authority for the statement from the Administration or any officer connected with it that justified the rumor which prevailed in the House on yesterday.
> I find in the Evening Star of this city on yesterday, which I believe speaks on behalf of the Administration, a telegram from the Associated Press dated Havana, April 6, which says:
> "The Government deserves great credit for the fact that in a time of national excitement the best of order is preserved in Havana. The streets are as quiet as the most exacting could ask, while the ordinary avocations are pursued without break or molestation.
> "It is safe to say that Havana at this hour is far quieter than Washington, New York, or Chicago. Of course, many business men have made their preparations to suspend trading until times are quieter and the vexed questions are settled."
> Not only that, Mr. Speaker—not only does the Star use these words, but this morning, in the New York Journal, I find a dispatch dated Havana, April 6, at 6 p. m., using this language:
> "The attitude of the public is one of quiet expectancy. The order maintained in the city is admirable.
> "Consul-General Lee assures the correspondent of the Associated Press that he has received no instructions to leave Havana."
> And this morning the Washington Post of this city says:
> "The attitude of the public is one of quiet expectancy. The order maintained in the city is admirable.
> "Consul-General Lee assures the correspondent of the Associated Press that he has received no instructions to leave Havana.
> * * * * * * * *
> "The Fern, Bache, and Mangrove are still in the harbor, with no orders, and with no indications of leaving for the north."
> What, then, are we to expect or what to believe? If the Associated Press and the dispatches that appear in these papers tell the truth, then there is nothing to justify the statement sent to the Capitol on yesterday. I say, my friends, there will be no war.

I say that the man who represents me as having said anything else than what I have just read from the stenographer's notes is capable of the three representations, within three different days, of the three different policies of the Administration, as indicated and demonstrated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] as against the expressions of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. There is no consistency in anything my friend from Ohio would say upon the floor of this House. I am a young man ready to learn from him, for he is old and gray in wisdom, and on the 6th of last January and in May, 1897, he was full of fire and enthusiasm in support of the Cubans. He almost insulted his own party when he read to you the Cuban platform of St. Louis, as I reminded you all last week when I read from his enthusiastic effort in support of Cuba.

He twitted the rest of you then for violating the Republican platform on Cuba as he was violating it on the civil service; he twitted you then of unusual delay in enforcing your platform of two years ago and keeping your pledge to the people. Now, because we rely on the indications which came by the Associated Press, which is worthy of more credence than anything the gentleman from Ohio has said, he attacks me in my methods of argument by setting up a falsehood and then knocking it down.

I never said that "Consul-General Lee sent no telegram." I said all the telegrams and information indicated that there was no danger to any American in Cuba at this time. I want to say more than that: It is not necessary for the Americans to leave Cuba, for in thirty-six hours any American there can put himself behind the poor Cubans, who even now, weak and hungry as they are, are too strong for the thousands of Spanish cowards, tyrants, traitors, and assassins. [Applause.]

And now comes the Evening Star of this very day, confirming all I have said about the delay in the message. I read the headlines and news from the very first page, as follows:

IN THE DARK AT HAVANA—WONDERING WHY PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE DID NOT GO IN—CITY REMAINS TRANQUIL—GENERAL LEE PRAISES THE AUTHORITIES AND PEOPLE FOR THEIR FORBEARANCE.

[Special cablegram from a staff correspondent.]

HAVANA, April 7, 1898.

This morning everything is quiet. Holy Thursday is being celebrated with much patriotic fervor.

PEPPER.

HAVANA, April 6.

In Havana it is not understood why President McKinley did not transmit his message to Congress to-day, but the city is quiet.

I read again from the same column of the same paper an account by the Associated Press as follows:

HAVANA, April 7.

There is no excitement here to-day, and no reason for any, so far as it is possible to see. The weather is cloudy. Holy Thursday is being observed in a quiet manner.

The Mascotte is expected to return here to-day and leave for Tampa to-night.

The Olivette will be here and the Bache and Mangrove are ready in the harbor to take any passengers designated by the United States consul-general. The latter has not decided when he will send the American citizens away.

What a godsend it would be to the poor, ignorant people who are "in the dark at Havana wondering why the President's message did not go in" if they could only have the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], the Delphic oracle of the Administration, to throw some light on the policy of the President in withholding the message!

The quotation just read from the Associated Press in so many words says our "consul-general has not yet decided when he will send the American citizens away." An effort was made to distort my remarks as a reflection on Consul-General Lee, but the reading of the RECORD will show that not a word was spoken nor an insinuation made against the high honor and dignity of General Lee.

General Lee's courageous record and steadfast Americanism are well known and beyond attack, and far beyond the necessity of having the distinguished services of the Administration orator and oracle.

But side issues and misrepresentation of my statements will not avail the Administration nor its champion to divert the attention of the American people from the brutality of Spain in her barbarous and savage warfare of starving innocent women and children and her cowardly assassination of 266 Americans who were assured they were in the friendly harbor of a civilized nation.

How great the contrast between the wabbling and halting policy of our Administration when compared with that of the young Hohenzollern Emperor of Germany is best shown by an account given in the Washington Post of last Sunday, as follows:

GERMANY ACTS PROMPTLY—WILL ENFORCE HER DEMAND FOR INDEMNITY FOR LOSSES IN CUBA—SPANISH GOVERNMENT INFORMED THAT IF REPARATION IS NOT FORTHCOMING GERMANY WILL PUNISH AND SECURE DAMAGES BY FORCE.

BERLIN, April 2, 1898.

The German Government proposes to take prompt action to obtain indemnity in the Cannamabra case. The foreign office has demanded full and immediate redress for the outrage upon German citizens and property, and a German war ship will soon be sent to Havana if satisfaction is not forthcoming in short order.

The Spanish ambassador here, Señor Mendez de Vigo, has had lengthy conferences with Baron von Bulow, the German Minister for Foreign Affairs, who convinced the ambassadors that Germany intended to have complete satisfaction, including an indemnity, for the property destroyed and for the lives taken.

The ambassador was also informed that unless the redress was forthcoming Germany would herself act, secure damages, and punish the offenders.

As an incentive to quick reparation, Baron von Bulow added that provisional orders had been cabled to the commander of the German war ship Geier to sail in the direction of Cuba. The Spanish ambassador promised that he would exert himself to the utmost to comply with the German demands.

The outrage complained of occurred on March 18 last in the Trinidad district of the province of Santa Clara, when a band of insurgents attacked the German sugar refinery at Cannamabra, destroyed the plant, and killed four persons connected with it. The incident has convinced Germany that Spain is unable to protect the lives of foreigners in Cuba. The German cruiser Geier is now believed to be in West Indian waters.

A German sugar refinery destroyed and the lives of only four men sacrificed, and that by insurgents, not Spanish officers! This on the 18th of March, and on the 2d of April Berlin makes her demands. Our majestic battle ship and 266 Americans at the bottom of Havana Harbor, and not even yet, after almost two months have passed away, does our Administration know what it wants or what to do.

Only one thing is certain, and that is the stock gambler is very busy and prosperous, while all true Americans are humiliated and the flag is without honor; our sailors are impatient, our soldiers are indignant, and our wives and mothers and our daughters are weeping in sympathy with the mothers and sisters of 266 unavenged American citizens.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LENTZ. I would like to have the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope that consent will be given. I understand the gentleman is going to speak along this same line?

Mr. LENTZ. Oh, yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MITCHELL. I object, Mr. Speaker, unless the gentleman withdraws the personal attack upon the President of the United States and against certain Senators.

Mr. LENTZ. The gentleman from New York is mistaken. It is unnecessary to make that condition, because I made no personal attacks upon anybody.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I withdraw the objection.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on this section and the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks for the previous question for the section under discussion and its amendments.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to appeal to the gentleman from Iowa in charge of the bill, in behalf of fair play.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There has been no discussion on this section.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Speaker, the objection to extending my remarks in the RECORD has been withdrawn.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the second section has been under discussion legitimately two hours.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But it has not been discussed.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman from Iowa is not responsible for that, and I had agreed with a great many members that I would make this motion. It is for the House to say whether they want more discussion or not, but in justice to gentlemen who are anxious to conclude the bill, I make the motion.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DOCKERY) there were 123 ayes and 118 noes.

Mr. DOCKERY. Tellers, Mr. Speaker.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. HULL and Mr. DOCKERY tellers.

Mr. HULL (pending the division). Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] suggests that an agreement of twenty minutes on a side may be satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that proceedings for the previous question thus far taken may be vacated, and that twenty minutes on a side be allowed for debate. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hear none.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, stated this morning that sections 1 and 2 were the only sections that related to the reorganization of the Army and that he would withdraw all the other sections, I thought there would be no further discussion upon this bill, as all seemed to be in favor of the reorganization suggested by the committee. But in a controversy between the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] it was developed that there was a provision contained in the second section of this bill which provided for an increase of the Army; and inasmuch as the discussion which has been had on this section has not been germane to the subject-matter, it seems to me that we ought to discuss it at some length.

Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of the reorganization of the Army upon the three-battalion basis, as I am confident that under modern condition of arms it can thereby become more effective. The single-battalion organization of infantry, which we have had ever since the civil war, may have been very good when men fought in battle within elbow touch of each other and were supported by a line immediately in their rear. But the improvement of the field arms from a muzzle loader to a rapid-firing Springfield rifle with an increase of deadly range from 600 yards to 2,500 yards, would make it suicidal to have now any such arrangement of men in the field of battle. To lead them to battle in that array is to lead them to their death. The modern line of battle is bound to be composed of men stationed several feet apart.

In the late war a colonel could keep in view the men in his entire regiment, because they were marshaled close to each other and in double file, but it will now be impossible to do so since there has arisen the necessity of separating the men in line of battle and having the supporting line considerably in the rear.

Nothing is so essential to perfect organization and effective strength of a regiment in battle as the ability of the officer to see all the soldiers under his command, and of all the soldiers to be able to see the officer. It is therefore imperative that instead of the old system we should have the regiment consist of three battalions of four companies each. This change has been recommended by every Secretary of War for the past twenty years, and by such illustrious generals as Grant, Sherman, and Sheridan.

Mr. Speaker, section 2 does provide for an increase of the Army in time of war. No person can read that section without knowing it. The sentiment of this House yesterday seemed to be almost unanimous against increasing the Regular Army, and yet in the second section, now to be voted upon, there is contained a provision for two additional companies for each regiment in the Regular Army of the United States. I say to you gentlemen who have spoken here in favor of the National Guard, I say to you who have lifted your voices in behalf of the volunteers, that this section discriminates against both of these classes.

Mr. MARSH. The gentleman will allow me to say that the second section not only provides for two more companies, but it provides for filling up two additional companies, making four.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] says that this section not only provides for the two additional companies in each regiment, but also provides for filling up the two skeleton companies in each regiment, making an increase of four companies in each regiment of the Regular Army; and he is unquestionably right.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we have lost sight of the provisions of this section; and the idea of voting upon it without any discussion and without knowing its contents is something that never should have been suggested. Mr. Speaker, I believe there should be no increase of the Regular Army of the United States in time of peace or in time of war. I believe that the additional forces needed in time of war should come from the volunteers.

If we are to have a war with Spain—and war seems now inevitable—I want the National Guard of my State and of the other States of the Union to share in the glory of our victory. The National Guard of the State of Colorado is composed of the intelligent, active, and courageous young men of that Commonwealth. They are the flower of the fighting force of the Rocky Mountain region, and I am confident that they will make as good soldiers as any that will enter the field of battle.

Mr. Speaker, the Volunteer Army of the United States has always been capable of fighting valiantly the battles of the Union. They have never faltered. The reason they can always be relied upon is because they are composed of our best citizens. There is reason why a volunteer soldier is often braver and more courageous than one who enlists in the Regular Army. The reason is simply the statement of a philosophical truth.

The privates of the Regular Army are mostly men who have enlisted for an occupation and not for the high purpose of righting a wrong. The ambitious, aggressive young man will not join the Regular Army, because he is not content to lead the inactive life made necessary by times of peace. The soldier of the Regular Army acts as a machine, fighting whether he approves the cause of war or not. The volunteer only enters the Army in times of war and when inspired by the justice of the cause.

The man who is animated by the sense of right always fights boldly, valiantly, desperately. Shakespeare has well said, "Thrice is he armed who hath his quarrel just;" and no truer aphorism was ever expressed. It is on this account that the volunteer, armed with the justice of the cause, becomes eager to fight for the defense and honor of his country, and becomes an intrepid, invincible soldier.

Mr. HULL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I should be glad to have the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. On Monday last I reported from the Committee on Appropriations a joint resolution to enable the President to cause to be constructed fortifications on private lands under certain conditions, and I asked unanimous consent for its consideration. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] objected. Fortunately, it was suspension day, and I moved to suspend the rules and pass the bill. That action was taken after twenty minutes' debate upon each side. The gentleman from Texas addressed the House after I had addressed it for a few minutes. Then I stated, as the gentleman now claims:

> I believe I have the right to close; and I want not more than two or three minutes. I will ask the gentleman to consume some more of his time.

I had the right to close. The gentleman did proceed to consume his time by yielding to the Representative from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ] and the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE], who opposed the resolution. He also yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD], who advocated the resolution, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX], who advocated the resolution; and I also yielded to the gentleman from Georgia at that point some time.

Now, after the resolution had been both opposed and advocated on his own side, the gentleman, notwithstanding his objection in the first instance to its consideration, announced magnanimously that he would vote for the resolution. By that time there were members upon my committee, the Committee on Appropriations, who desired time—the gentleman's colleague from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. BAILEY. To reply to what I had said.

Mr. CANNON. They wanted time upon the bill.

Now, I did not take exceeding two to five minutes, although I had the right to take whatever of the time on our side I might choose to take. I yielded to those gentlemen as I had a right to yield.

I should not have referred to this matter had it not been that the gentleman has picked out a sentence here and a sentence there and, it seemed to me, sought to impute bad faith on my part upon that occasion. If such was his intention, I do not propose to let the matter rest without repelling the insinuation, and I have referred to it now that the attention of the House might be called to it and the truth appear of record.

It is not very important what the gentleman said on that occasion or what I said. The important thing is that the gentleman objected to the consideration of the bill, which objection was fatal, until there was a motion to suspend the rules, which fortunately could be entertained on that Monday; and the bill did pass. I am very glad that in the end the gentleman voted for the bill the consideration of which he objected to when he supposed the objection would be fatal.

Mr. BAILEY. Why does not the gentleman tell the whole truth and say that I objected upon the express ground that before any more preparations were made for war I wanted to know whether we were to have war or not? That statement is in the RECORD.

Mr. CANNON. That is a matter of argument. I am willing with that statement, so far as I am concerned, that the record remain. The material point is that the resolution which ought to have been passed did pass; and the country does not care much what I said or what the gentleman said.

Mr. HULL. I yield for one minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], that he may submit a request.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman has allowed me a moment, I desire to ask, in the time yielded to me, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ]—having made a statement as to the character of the remarks he wishes to add to the RECORD—be allowed to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. When we went into this discussion, the discussion ought to have been confined to the bill, and upon an amendment that was offered by the committee to the second section of the bill. That was the amendment that we were talking about, and trying to get into the bill. Now, this second section contains the whole germ of the bill, substantially. And I make the inquiry, Is it competent to offer an amendment at this time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. COX. Then I desire, on page 5, line 15, of the bill, to insert the proviso in that section as an amendment to the second section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is that an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. COX. It is, sir.

The SPEAKER. Offered by the committee?

Mr. HULL. I reserve the point of order until I hear from the gentleman.

Mr. COX. If the chairman will understand me, I do not think he will make the point of order.

If you will turn to the fifth page of the bill, section 9, you will find added there a proviso as to what is to be done with the increased force of the Army if peace is restored. This ought to be a provision added to the second section of the bill. This proviso

I will read, and move to amend the second section of the bill, adding the proviso now at the end of the ninth section of the bill.

The proviso is as follows:

Provided further, That at the end of any war in which the United States may become involved the Army shall be reduced to a peace basis by the transfer or absorption, through promotion, of supernumerary officers and the honorable discharge or transfer of supernumerary enlisted men; and nothing contained in this act shall be construed as authorizing an increase of the enlisted force of the Regular Army beyond that now provided by law.

That, Mr. Speaker, ought to follow the second section of the bill. I hope the chairman has no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as pending.

Mr. HULL. I make no point of order on it.

There being no objection, the amendment was considered as pending.

Mr. HULL. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY].

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Speaker, in the five minutes allotted to me, I can waive the consideration of anything else except the single question of the increase of the standing army made by the first two sections of the bill.

I understand now from the chairman of this committee that he proposes to dispense with all of the bill except the first and second sections. This bill leaves the twenty-five regiments of infantry in the Regular Army to remain in existence, and provides in time of war for the addition of two companies to each regiment.

Mr. RIDGELY. Four companies.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I am speaking now with reference to the officers. It provides for ten companies in each regiment, as the present law does, and it provides that two of these companies shall be simply composed of officers, but without men.

A MEMBER. That is the "skeleton" company.

Mr. CONNOLLY (continuing). It provides in time of war that these two unmanned companies shall be filled up to their maximum, and provides that two new companies shall be added to each regiment with officers and men complete. This is only in case when war has been declared by Congress or the condition of war is recognized as existing.

Now we have the twelve companies of enlisted men. They are fully officered. They go through the war and the war ends. Now, what are you to do with the accretion of officers that has come to the Army? The gentleman from Tennessee, by the motion he made to amend this bill, recognizes that condition. It shows the necessity for making some provision to reduce the Regular Army after you have increased it to 104,000 men in time of war.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CONNOLLY. No; it is not necessary in the brief time at my disposal.

Mr. COX. I think the gentleman is mistaken; and I desired to correct a misstatement of facts.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I do not think I misunderstand the amendment. The gentleman seeks, by his amendment, to meet the very point I am making. He seeks to add the proviso found on page 5 to the second section of the bill, which is a provision for reducing the Regular Army to the minimum when peace has been restored. But how do you reduce it?

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman pardon me? I know he wants to get at the facts.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Excuse me. I have only five minutes.

Mr. COX. But the House ought to have the facts.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I claim they shall know them if you will let me alone.

Mr. COX. You are not telling them.

Mr. CONNOLLY. How do you reduce it by that proviso? Listen to the language of it:

Provided further, That at the end of any war in which the United States may become involved the Army shall be reduced to a peace basis.

Mark now the way to reduce it to a peace basis.

By the transfer or absorption, through promotion, of supernumerary officers and the honorable discharge or transfer of supernumerary enlisted men.

How many supernumerary officers are created? The report of the committee shows us, on page 5, that for the infantry alone there are 250 supernumerary second lieutenants. There are 50 first lieutenants; there are 50 captains for the infantry alone, making 450.

Mr. HULL. I will yield to the gentleman all the time that I occupy. He does not, of course, want to state to the House that the first two sections do that. That would be if we add the first and second lieutenants to the different companies of all the regiments.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I beg your pardon. Your report shows that by the entire bill you add 120 second lieutenants in the cavalry; you add 84 second lieutenants in the artillery; you add 350 second lieutenants in the infantry.

Mr. HULL. That is provided for in the other sections, which are to be stricken out.

Mr. CONNOLLY. You only provide, in the sections to be stricken out, for the addition of the officers to the cavalry and the addition to the officers of the artillery.

Mr. HULL. And the infantry—one lieutenant for each company.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Not in the sections you strike out.

Mr. HULL. Yes; one for each company.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULL. I yield one minute more to the gentleman. I have occupied a minute of his time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Now, I call the attention of the House to this. This is probably intended by the committee innocently, but if the committee understood this bill as well as the captain or lieutenant of the War Department who drew the bill understood it, they never would have sought to introduce that measure into this House. It will be seen in that very proviso that there is no purpose of reducing the new officers that come into existence, because the last clause of it is this:

And nothing contained in this act shall be construed as authorizing an increase of the enlisted force of the Regular Army beyond that now provided by law.

The enlisted force is to be disposed of when peace comes, but the supernumerary officers, numbering hundreds, are not to be disposed of. And when I called the attention of the chairman to this to-day and said, "You should provide for mustering out those officers, too," he said, "Why, no; you never could expect a lieutenant in the Regular Army to accept a captaincy if he is to be mustered out of service at the end of the war."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] to use some of his time. I have used ten minutes. If the gentleman is going to use any part of his time, I should be glad to have him use it now.

Mr. HULL. I have used about five minutes. I do not know that I shall want to use more than very little of my time.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON].

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill from the first section to the last. I am opposed to it because I am opposed to all increases in the standing army. I believe that it is a dangerous thing to have a large standing army in a republic. The tendency of all republics is toward imperialism, and as time goes on, as a republican form of government drifts toward a strong centralized power, then the demand comes for a large standing army.

We have traveled along that road so far now that it begins to be necessary, as an adjunct to the tendency toward imperialism, to increase the standing army. And whether it be the intention of the committee or the party in power, which that committee represents, to take advantage of the present condition of the country and the excitement among the people in regard to war to give us a larger standing army or not I do not know; but of one thing I am sure—that we are making rapid strides in that direction. I believe it is a bad policy, and we ought not to give way to the present moment of excitement.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. We want to hear what the gentleman from Kansas is saying, and the House is in disorder.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen who desire to converse will please retire to the cloakroom, where conversation can be more free.

Mr. SIMPSON. If I have read correctly the history of our country, the warning of the fathers who established this Republic upon this continent was to the effect that we should beware of establishing in this country a large standing army; and the immortal Jefferson said the reliance of a republican government should be on its citizen soldiery.

I indorse every word that has been said in this debate in regard to the dependence upon the volunteer force to maintain the honor and credit of the nation. A standing army is made up of men who have no great material interest in the country, but enlist in a standing army to get a position and a job, so to speak. They are not defending their own country; but, as Bob Ingersoll well said, "No man will fight valiantly for a boarding house."

Therefore the basis of reliance by our people, as a Government and as a Republic, should be upon the citizens of that Republic who have some material interest in it, who fight not for a boarding house, but fight for their common homes and their own country. I hope this bill will be defeated; but if we get into actual hostility with Spain, as I hope we will not, we will again rest upon the strong arm of the citizens of this Republic to defend its honor.

But if that war does come, I hope and trust we will be able to put it upon a high plane as defenders of civilization, as defenders of a free country, a free government, and the right for a struggling people to establish that kind of a government and govern themselves, and not be put upon the low plane of stealing the territory of some other country. If we can not make the issue upon that line, we can not justify ourselves before the nations of the world.

I am for my country, and to a certain extent I am for my country right or wrong; but when that motto trenches upon right and justice, I draw the line. I say that no country can afford to go to war in this nineteenth century that does not have ample justification before it appeals to the bloody arbitration of the sword. And in this struggle which they say is about to come we must say to the world we are now going to enter into this struggle and prevent Spain from digging up the barbarities of the sixteenth century and flaunting them in our face, that we will fight this battle on that line, and we will give to the Republic of Cuba that is struggling to free itself the same rights that we have declared in our Declaration of Independence—life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and the right to govern themselves. [Applause.] And when the issue is made upon that plane you will have a cause that will inspire the love of justice and right, that will bring to the defense of the country the best fighting material in the world. [Applause.]

Mr. DOCKERY. I now yield four minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH].

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman [Mr. HULL] in charge of this bill proposes to abandon all of it except the first and second sections. Am I right?

Mr. HULL. You are.

Mr. MARSH. It has been said on this floor, Mr. Speaker, by the gentleman who was advocating the passage of these two sections of the bill that these two sections only provide for a battalion organization of the Army.

Mr. COX. In the time of peace.

Mr. MARSH. Now, I do not want a false impression to exist in this House. Instead of these two sections only providing for a battalion organization, they do provide for a large increase in the enlisted men and in the officers of the Regular Army. The first section of the bill provides, in time of peace, for 25 more majors. Now, I do not like to stand in the way of the promotion of 25 gallant, worthy captains in the infantry; but it is a question for this House to determine, whether we need 25 more majors of infantry in the peace establishment.

The second section of the bill provides for 50 more companies in time of war to be added to the regular establishment, and provides for the filling by enlisted men of the 2 existing skeleton companies of each regiment. In other words, in time of war the second section will authorize the enlistment and filling up of 100 companies of enlisted men and officers. The section does not say how large the companies shall be, nor how small they shall be. I hold the power is given in that section to enlist 100 companies, and it provides for the increase of the enlisted force of the Regular Army about 10,000 men, and it provides for the complete officering of 50 companies in addition to what you now have.

If you adopt the first and second sections, you leave the bill in a most incomplete state, without knowing how many men are to go into these additional companies, whether they are to be companies of 100, or more or less. In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, the best thing the House can do with this bill is to recommit it to the Committee on Military Affairs. [Applause.]

I will only add that this increase would be not only 100 companies, which, if they were 100 men strong, would amount to 10,000 additional men, but there would be an increase of something like 175 officers in addition to the 25 majors included in the first section.

Mr. HULL. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, as I spoke a little while ago, I do not wish to obtrude myself unduly upon the House, and I would not speak at all but for certain statements which have been made here contradicting, or impliedly contradicting, what I have said. I say that this bill does not increase the Regular Army in time of peace except to the extent of 25 majors. I say that this increase is absolutely necessary in order to carry out the three-battalion system. I say that this three-battalion system is the system now in use by all the civilized nations of the world and is used by our own National Guard.

Mr. CONNOLLY. What is to become of the 150 company officers in time of peace?

Mr. HAY. I will come to that point in a moment.

I was about to answer the various points which have been made against the second section of the bill, the first section having been disposed of. One of those points is that there will be 5,000 men added to the Regular Army in time of war.

That is true; and why? Because it is necessary to add those 5,000 men in order to carry out the three-battalion system, which is the gravamen of this bill—the leading feature which makes its passage a necessity, whether there is going to be war or not. The question of war, so far as I am concerned, has nothing to do with this matter. Those 5,000 men, who will belong to the infantry alone, are authorized by the bill as it stands; there is no question about that.

The gentleman from Illinois asks, "How do you know how many men you are going to add to each company?" The gentleman knows very well that under the law as it now stands there are in time of peace 50 men in an infantry company, and that the President can increase the company to 100 men in time of war.

Mr. MARSH. I know just the contrary.

Mr. HAY. I know what I am saying. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] has the law before him, I will read it for the benefit of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH]. I have stated the existing law, which will be found in section 1079 of the abstract of our military laws. You can not add more than 50 men in time of war to any infantry company beyond the number now in time of peace—50 men. That is true; that is the law; that is all the addition you can make under the existing law.

Therefore the 5,000 men in these 25 regiments are all that you can add in time of war. If that is true—and it will be done solely to carry out the three-battalion system—then so far as the enlisted men are concerned there can be no objection to the provisions of this bill.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] asks what are you going to do in time of peace with the 150 officers who will be added by this bill? The gentleman from Tennessee has offered a proviso, which reads:

That the Army shall be reduced to a peace basis by the transfer or absorption through promotion of supernumerary officers.

Mr. CONNOLLY. That still leaves them in the employ of the Government.

Mr. HAY. It still leaves them in the employ of the Government. But some of them may be retired; some may be transferred from one command to another. In that way these officers can be and will be absorbed.

In what way, I ask the gentleman, could we turn out these officers? Suppose a cadet who graduated at West Point in June last should, by his bravery upon the field of battle in a war with Spain or any other country, be promoted to a colonelcy by the 1st of next August, could you, at the end of the war, turn him out?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HULL. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. HAY. I was asking this question: If a cadet or any young officer should by bravery in war succeed in becoming a colonel, how would you provide for turning him out? In what way will you provide a class of officers to be turned out at the end of any war?

Mr. CONNOLLY. You can turn out the volunteer officers.

Mr. HAY. You can not turn out the volunteer officers, but if so you would not have the three-battalion system. The gentleman smiles. But he is smiling at the greatest military wisdom of the world.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, upon my amendment, I ask the gentleman from Iowa to yield to me four or five minutes.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I have but seven minutes of the time remaining. I do not believe there will be any objection to the gentleman's amendment. I am willing to yield him two minutes, and reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. COX. But, Mr. Speaker, the first thing I wish to refer to in the time yielded to me is that I do not want any more pictures to be laid on my desk about Cuba.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the pages should not have done such a thing.

Mr. COX. And I do not want anybody else to do it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has suggested to the Doorkeeper its impropriety.

Mr. COX. I do not want them to approach me in that manner.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the point on this bill to which I desire to refer. In time of war, and do not forget it, if you are going to put the Army on the three-battalion organization, you can not do it successfully without a modification here such as I have suggested.

I crave the attention of the House for a moment. You want to make the Army effective and of force, but this bill in the second section provides at any time, after the declaration of war by Congress, in the most emphatic language and in the most positive character that can be put into the bill, that then we shall organize the Army by the addition of two companies. And for what purpose? That is to put them in the battalion organization.

I venture to say that there is not a man on this floor who would undertake to take a regiment or brigade into battle—if he ever heard one—and try to control them under the old system of our military and company organization. Now, that is the condition in time of war. You enlist your two companies so as to have three battalions in a regiment commanded by a major. But what is the increase, and what is the point of trouble in this connection?

You call for volunteers to fill up the skeleton companies of the Regular Army, and the volunteers come; but the law limits you and says how far you shall go. But suppose you had this power, and the amendment does not intend to change the existing law that is on your statute books to-day; then why this little fight that is on a mere quibble when you have voted $50,000,000 for public defense, and if you ever win a battle now, Mr. Speaker, mark my words when I tell you that the boys who hold the muskets are the ones who are going to win it.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HULL. I wish to reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I would like the attention of the House for the few moments remaining to me. Let me say that this is not in any sense a partisan measure. If evidence were required to vindicate that fact, the appearance upon the floor of the eloquent gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] and my able friend from Tennessee [Mr. COX] in support of the bill would be a sufficient refutation of such a suggestion. The issue raised by this bill is nonpartisan in all respects, but, in my judgment, this is a pernicious measure and ought not to pass. It can be, should be, and indubitably will be considered solely from the standpoint of the public interests.

Mr. Speaker, what do the two sections of the bill that remain accomplish? The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. HULL] has abandoned all other sections except the first and the second. All the rest are to be eliminated by consent. I have heretofore asked to recommit the bill to the committee for the purpose of reconstructing it along the line of the manifest sentiment of the House which has developed since its consideration began. But the gentleman from Iowa declines to accede to this request.

Mr. Speaker, the first section adds 25 majors to the Regular Army in time of peace. I do not object so strenuously to that provision, but I am opposed to the bill as a whole because of my unalterable hostility to any increase of the infantry and cavalry arms of the Regular Army either in peace or war. I challenge the attention of the House to the effect of the second section. We should fully understand its purpose before agreeing to its provisions. This second section of the bill repeals the existing law which has been upon our statute books since 1877, fixing the maximum limit of the standing Army at 25,000 men.

It repeals that law, and in the discretion of the President, after a declaration of war, there can be added to the Army not less than 5,000 enlisted men and not less than 150 officers. If this House desires to enter upon the policy of increasing the Regular Army, then let us vote to enact the first and second sections of the bill. I protest against the contemplated reversal of the policy of the fathers and the increase of the standing Army.

Mr. MARSH. I say it means 10,000 men.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman from Illinois declares that the section under consideration authorizes an increase of 10,000 men.

Mr. STEELE. But it does not, all the same.

Mr. DOCKERY. The proper construction of the second section is somewhat in doubt and the views of gentlemen are not in harmony, a fact obviously indicating the necessity of sending this bill back to the committee and perfecting it in plain terms along the lines of justice both to the Regular Army and the volunteer soldiers of the United States. Sir, I have no criticism to make of the Regular Army. I take a just pride in its achievements, which have illustrated the highest order of courage, skill, and patriotism on hundreds of battlefields.

The Regular Army has written much of American history that will remain forever. West Point has been the nursery of its illustrious heroes. We should cherish this great military school and properly maintain the Army, but let us not forget the splendid feats in arms accomplished by the volunteer armies of the Union. Mr. Speaker, this bill was conceived in the War Department. It had its birth in a desire for active service and promotion by the officers of the Regular Army.

When it came originally to this House it was in utter disregard of the interests of the volunteer soldiers. If the gallant men we represent desire to enlist in the Army under this bill to aid in establishing Cuban freedom, they must enlist as privates and be commanded by officers of the Regular Army. Sir, speaking for one of the proudest districts of Missouri, for a constituency without a superior, ready and eager to defend our country in the coming war with Spain, I insist upon their right to enlist in Missouri regiments under the flag of the United States and not in regiments of the Regular Army. [Applause.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire, Mr. Speaker, for my own information, as well as, I hope, for the information of the House, to hear from the chairman of the committee [Mr. HULL] just what increase the first section of this bill will make to the service on its peace basis?

Mr. HULL. The first section will add 45 majors on a peace basis.

Mr. BINGHAM. And no others?

Mr. HULL. Absolutely no others, either officers or men.

Mr. BINGHAM. Now, the second section provides that—the President, in his discretion, may establish a third battalion for each infantry regiment—in time of war. Now, supposing that the President exercises the broadest discretion under this paragraph, what will it increase the Regular Army in conditions of war?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, that could be more easily answered if we knew who is right in the contention as to what the law is now on the power of the President. If the gentleman is correct, it would be impossible to organize the third battalion in a regiment without further action of Congress by which the President would be empowered to call for the troops.

Mr. BINGHAM. The act of 1870, to which the gentleman refers, is the act which indicates the character and number of companies, with the limitation of 50.

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. The act was first enacted in an army bill, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] has stated; but in 1886, sixteen years after 1870, there is the following language:

For expenses of recruiting and transportation of recruits from rendezvous to depot, $107,302.50. And no money appropriated by this act shall be paid for recruiting the Army beyond the number of 25,000 enlisted men, including Indian scouts and hospital stewards; and thereafter there shall be no more than 25,000 enlisted men in the Army at any one time, unless otherwise authorized by law.

There has never been any other authorization by law. Now, I want to know what will be the increase of the Army if the President exercises the broadest discretion.

Mr. HULL. If the President exercises the broadest discretion, it would be filling two companies.

Mr. BINGHAM. In each regiment?

Mr. HULL. Yes; in each regiment.

Mr. BINGHAM. How much would that be—the sum total?

Mr. HULL. It would be an increase of 5,000 men.

Mr. BINGHAM. How many officers?

Mr. HULL. It would be an increase of the officers of two companies to a regiment.

Mr. BINGHAM. How many?

Mr. HULL. Fifty captains, 50 first lieutenants, and 50 second lieutenants.

Mr. BINGHAM. One hundred and fifty.

Mr. HULL. Yes; and under no possible construction could that number be exceeded.

Mr. BINGHAM. From where are they selected under the law?

Mr. HULL. Under the law now, if there are vacancies in the Regular Army, there are several ways in which they can be filled.

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes.

Mr. HULL. One, of course, is from West Point.

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes; that is by the graduation of classes.

Mr. HULL. The graduation class. The other would be through promotion from the ranks by competitive examination. I want to say that a great many of the best officers in the Army are boys that had to enlist in the ranks and study and drill at the same time in order to win their commissions.

Mr. BINGHAM. That I would dispute.

Mr. HULL. I do not believe it is open to dispute. There is another class the President can appoint. In every college and every school of the United States where there is a military instructor the boy that shows the greatest proficiency in military tactics has his name sent to the War Department as eligible to appointment to the Regular Army.

Mr. BINGHAM. That covers the ground.

Mr. HULL. That covers the ground.

Mr. BINGHAM. Now, when you return to a peace basis what is your change?

Mr. HULL. In the establishment where these men——

Mr. BINGHAM. What becomes of the officers?

Mr. HULL. The officers in service would not be mustered out unless Congress hereafter so provides.

Mr. BINGHAM. They would remain in the service?

Mr. HULL. They remain in the service.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then those who had graduated at West Point would not have a chance for examination for promotion?

Mr. HULL. Now, then, with reference to the officers in the service, the Government could do what we did after the civil war closed—have a board to select the least deserving officers, and let them be mustered out, as we did then.

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes.

Mr. HULL. But we do not provide that the officers for the two extra companies shall absolutely be mustered out. If you did so, you might drive out of the service some of the best class of officers in the service. I want to say that under the law as it stands to-day, without additional authority from Congress increasing the Army, the third battalions would not be organized except in such regiments as the President should provide with three battalions, skeletonizing the force in other regiments to keep the force at the number fixed by law.

But you say, How will you get it? Your law fixes the number of men at 26,010 of all arms, with ten companies, in an infantry regiment. The law does not say what should be mustered out and what should be done. It simply fixes a maximum of all arms. The President and the War Department worked out a scheme that can be made to operate in time of peace—using a number of companies that are in the service for the active list and skeletonizing certain others. And why should not that be done? When the time comes for calling out troops, I want to ask my friend from Pennsylvania——

Mr. BINGHAM. I want information.

Mr. HULL. I want to ask you, as a military man, if it is not a fact that for a short duration he could put these men into the regiments at the front, such men as were at the regimental post on the seacoast where there was no special danger, and use the other regiments as the President has done under the present law, and add the three battalions, skeletonizing more companies, and under the construction of the law it would be absolutely right?

If your theory and that of my friend from Illinois is correct, he would be compelled to do it. It is not a repeal of the present law. My friend from Missouri says that it repeals the law. It does not. It provides in certain contingencies what may be done, and requires further authority of Congress before it can be made operative. If Congress does not hereafter authorize more troops, nothing need be done. And this bill simply gives us the three-battalion organization.

Mr. BINGHAM. I wanted to make that emphatic.

Mr. HULL. It simply gives us that. It covers that. It may be that when Congress takes additional action it will enable the President to make the three battalions in time of peace. The bill does not do anything of the kind, and it could not be done without additional legislation. This system is recognized in every State of the Union where they have a National Guard well organized. I have several telegrams to-day——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that a motion to recommit may be submitted at this time.

Mr. STEELE. I will object right now, before you go any further.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the committee. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not think there is any objection to the amendments, and the vote can be taken on them in gross.

The SPEAKER. It seems to be informal. When it was made, there was no point of order. Therefore it will be taken as a separate amendment; and the first vote will be on that of the committee, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 4, strike out the words "in time of war" and insert "upon a declaration of war by Congress, or a declaration by Congress that war exists."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the second amendment.

The amendment was again read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the provisions of the bill from the close of section 2 to the end be stricken out.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Did not the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] offer a substitute for the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands it was not offered. The gentleman from Iowa asks for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HULL) there were—ayes 155, noes 61.

So the bill was recommitted.

On motion of Mr. DOCKERY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was recommitted was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourn it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman from Maine will permit me, before that motion is put, I understand that the Senate has adjourned until Monday, and therefore nothing important can be done between now and Monday. That being true, I am not disposed to resist his motion, but I ask unanimous consent that Tuesday be set apart, in lieu of Friday, for business on the Private Calendar, with the understanding that it shall not interfere with any report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. CANNON. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. BAILEY. It was done for the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. I think I shall have to object.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. DINGLEY; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BAILEY) there were—ayes 114, noes 80.

So the motion of Mr. DINGLEY was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

On April 1, 1898:

H. Res. 182. Joint resolution providing for the temporary admission free of duty of naval and military supplies procured abroad.

On April 4, 1898:

H. R. 5865. An act to authorize the Monroe Railway and Construction Company to construct a bridge across Red River at or near Grand Ecore, La.; and

H. R. 1803. An act for the relief of Joseph P. Patton.

WATERS OF THE RIO GRANDE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which, with the report and accompanying papers, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the House of Representatives:

In response to the resolution of the House of Representatives of March 2, 1898, requesting the President, "if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the House of Representatives a copy of the proceedings of the international commission on the subject of the equitable distribution of the waters of the Rio Grande River, required of said commission by the protocol signed May 6, 1896, by the Secretary of State and the minister of Mexico to the United States; also, the protest of Mr. Horcasitas, representing the citizens of Mexico, against the construction of dams by the Rio Grande Dam and Irrigation Company, and the action taken thereon," I transmit herewith reports from the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Attorney-General, with accompanying papers.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 7, 1898.

NOTE.—The accompanying papers are sent to the Senate in response to a similar resolution of that body.

Mr. ROYSE. Mr. Speaker, I want to give notice that on Monday, after the reading of the Journal, I will call up the election case, in the Sixteenth New York district, of Fairchild against Ward.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would suggest to the gentleman that that is District of Columbia day.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the House, in pursuance of its previous order, adjourned until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

MONDAY, April 11, 1898.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last, when, on motion of Mr. QUAY, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Jersey City, N. J., approving the action of the President in the present crisis between the United States and Spain, and praying Congress to give him every support; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor of the First Congregational Church of Rockford, Mass., and a petition of the Young People's Christian Union of the First Universalist Church of Southbridge, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in all Government buildings; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. QUAY presented a resolution adopted by the Oxford Club, of Philadelphia, Pa., favoring the employment of the land and naval forces of the United States in the immediate promotion of measures to force the Spanish flag from this continent and secure the independence of Cuba; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Independent Order of Good Templars of Potter and Tioga counties, in the State of Pennsylvania, favoring Congressional action providing for the forced independence and freedom of Cuba from Spanish rule; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

POLICY CONCERNING CUBA.

Mr. QUAY. In accordance with the request of the Trades League of Philadelphia, a body composed of 2,000 business firms of that city, and of highly respectable gentlemen, I desire to read a telegram received from them, it being in the nature of a petition, and to reply to it. I will ask the Secretary to read the telegram, if there is no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read the telegram.

The telegram was read, as follows:

[Telegram.]

PHILADELPHIA, April 5, 1898.

Hon. M. S. QUAY, Washington:

The Trades League of Philadelphia in special session to-day passed the following resolution unanimously:

"Whereas the Trades League of Philadelphia, an organization of nearly 2,000 business firms, appreciating the wise, conservative, and dignified policy of the President of the United States in his treatment of the very grave and momentous differences now existing between the Kingdom of Spain and the United States of America, and recognizing the fact that this policy, if persisted in by the President and aided by Congressional support, will in the end tend to maintain peace upon an honorable basis between the two nations and result in an equitable adjustment of the Cuban troubles: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the board of managers of the Trades League of Philadelphia commends the action of Congress in supporting the President in his endeavor to prevent war pending an adjustment by peaceable methods.

"Resolved, That we appeal to our representatives in Congress to continue to cooperate with the President and to accord him a full opportunity to exhaust all peaceful negotiations. Then, in the event of a failure of these measures, if war should follow, our country will have exhausted every reasonable means to maintain 'peace with honor.'"

Will you or Senator PENROSE please read in the Senate?

W. W. FOULKROD, President.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I desire to say to these gentlemen that I have little hesitancy in acceding to their very reasonable suggestion. I have an affectionate personal regard for the President and absolute confidence in his patriotic statesmanship. I have confidence that he will always be in accord with the best thought and interest of his country. The people of the United States, in my judgment, are pretty nearly unanimous that the time for negotiation upon the Cuban question is past—the present is a case for neither Pope, prelate, nor presbyter. They believe that further negotiations mean further time for the concentration of the Spanish naval forces and for general Spanish preparations for war. They know that a Spanish torpedo flotilla is en route for our shores whose mission is hostile, whose only interest can be to destroy our vessels as the Maine was destroyed and slay our sailors as the sailors of the Maine were slain. They know that on yesterday two Spanish war vessels sailed westward and will be with us in ten days. They believe that bloodshed will be averted or diminished by prompt action of the Government, not by declaring war, but by making war in self-defense before Spain can secure further naval or military advantage, and, perhaps without reason, that delay is largely sought or urged by those interested in the Spanish success, or by those who would market the national honor and make merchandise of the blood and bones of the dead of the Maine; that intervention should be armed, immediate, and impetuous; that not merely a stable but a republican form of government should be given the Cubans; that the Spaniards should get out of Cuba; they should stand not upon the order of their going, but go at once! For these purposes they believe the Army and Navy of the United States should be utilized until Cuba is free and the Maine is avenged. Believing that the President is with the ultimate purpose of the people, I have pleasure in assuring the Trades League of Philadelphia that I will comply with their request.

I move that the telegram be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERVENTION IN CUBAN AFFAIRS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, was received.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the message, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Obedient to that precept of the Constitution which commands the President to give from time to time to the Congress information of the state of the Union and to recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient, it becomes my duty to now address your body with regard to the grave crisis that has arisen in the relations of the United States to Spain by reason of the warfare that for more than three years has raged in the neighboring Island of Cuba.

I do so because of the intimate connection of the Cuban question with the state of our own Union and the grave relation the course which it is now incumbent upon the nation to adopt must needs bear to the traditional policy of our Government if it is to accord with the precepts laid down by the founders of the Republic and religiously observed by succeeding Administrations to the present day.

The present revolution is but the successor of other similar insurrections which have occurred in Cuba against the dominion of Spain, extending over a period of nearly half a century, each of which, during its progress, has subjected the United States to great effort and expense in enforcing its neutrality laws, caused enormous losses to American trade and commerce, caused irritation, annoyance, and disturbance among our citizens, and, by the exercise of cruel, barbarous, and uncivilized practices of warfare, shocked the sensibilities and offended the humane sympathies of our people.

Since the present revolution began, in February, 1895, this country has seen the fertile domain at our threshold ravaged by fire and sword in the course of a struggle unequaled in the history of the island and rarely paralleled as to the numbers of the combatants and the bitterness of the contest by any revolution of modern times where a dependent people striving to be free have been opposed by the power of the sovereign state.

Our people have beheld a once prosperous community reduced to comparative want, its lucrative commerce virtually paralyzed, its exceptional productiveness diminished, its fields laid waste, its mills in ruins, and its people perishing by tens of thousands from hunger and destitution. We have found ourselves constrained, in the observance of that strict neutrality which our laws enjoin, and which the law of nations commands, to police our own waters and watch our own seaports in prevention of any unlawful act in aid of the Cubans.

Our trade has suffered; the capital invested by our citizens in Cuba has been largely lost, and the temper and forbearance of our people have been so sorely tried as to beget a perilous unrest among our own citizens which has inevitably found its expression from time to time in the National Legislature, so that issues wholly external to our own body politic engross attention and stand in the way of that close devotion to domestic advancement that becomes a self-contained commonwealth whose primal maxim has been the avoidance of all foreign entanglements. All this must needs awaken, and has, indeed, aroused the utmost concern on the part of this Government, as well during my predecessor's term as in my own.

In April, 1896, the evils from which our country suffered through the Cuban war became so onerous that my predecessor made an effort to bring about a peace through the mediation of this Government in any way that might tend to an honorable adjustment of the contest between Spain and her revolted colony, on the basis of some effective scheme of self-government for Cuba under the flag and sovereignty of Spain. It failed through the refusal of the Spanish Government then in power to consider any form of mediation or, indeed, any plan of settlement which did not begin with the actual submission of the insurgents to the mother country, and then only on such terms as Spain herself might see fit to grant. The war continued unabated. The resistance of the insurgents was in no wise diminished.

The efforts of Spain were increased, both by the dispatch of fresh levies to Cuba and by the addition to the horrors of the strife of a new and inhuman phase happily unprecedented in the modern history of civilized Christian peoples. The policy of devastation and concentration, inaugurated by the Captain-General's bando of October 21, 1896, in the Province of Pinar del Rio was thence extended to embrace all of the island to which the power of the Spanish arms was able to reach by occupation or by military operations. The peasantry, including all dwelling in the open agricultural interior, were driven into the garrison towns or isolated places held by the troops.

The raising and movement of provisions of all kinds were interdicted. The fields were laid waste, dwellings unroofed and fired, mills destroyed, and, in short, everything that could desolate the land and render it unfit for human habitation or support was commanded by one or the other of the contending parties and executed by all the powers at their disposal.

By the time the present Administration took office a year ago, reconcentration, so called, had been made effective over the better part of the four central and western provinces—Santa Clara, Matanzas, Havana, and Pinar del Rio.

The agricultural population to the estimated number of 300,000 or more was herded within the towns and their immediate vicinage, deprived of the means of support, rendered destitute of shelter, left poorly clad, and exposed to the most unsanitary conditions. As the scarcity of food increased with the devastation of the depopulated areas of production, destitution and want became misery and starvation. Month by month the death rate increased in an alarming ratio. By March, 1897, according to conservative estimates from official Spanish sources, the mortality among the reconcentrados, from starvation and the diseases thereto incident, exceeded 50 per cent of their total number.

No practical relief was accorded to the destitute. The overburdened towns, already suffering from the general dearth, could give no aid. So-called "zones of cultivation" established within the immediate areas of effective military control about the cities and fortified camps proved illusory as a remedy for the suffering. The unfortunates, being for the most part women and children, with aged and helpless men, enfeebled by disease and hunger, could not have tilled the soil without tools, seed, or shelter for their own support or for the supply of the cities. Reconcentration, adopted avowedly as a war measure in order to cut off the resources of the insurgents, worked its predestined result. As I said in my message of last December, it was not civilized warfare; it was extermination. The only peace it could beget was that of the wilderness and the grave.

Meanwhile the military situation in the island had undergone a noticeable change. The extraordinary activity that characterized the second year of the war, when the insurgents invaded even the thitherto unharmed fields of Pinar del Rio and carried havoc and destruction up to the walls of the city of Havana itself, had relapsed into a dogged struggle in the central and eastern provinces. The Spanish arms regained a measure of control in Pinar del Rio and parts of Havana, but, under the existing conditions of the rural country, without immediate improvement of their productive situation. Even thus partially restricted, the revolutionists held their own, and their conquest and submission, put forward by Spain as the essential and sole basis of peace, seemed as far distant as at the outset.

In this state of affairs my Administration found itself confronted with the grave problem of its duty. My message of last December reviewed the situation and narrated the steps taken with a view to relieving its acuteness and opening the way to some form of honorable settlement. The assassination of the prime minister, Canovas, led to a change of government in Spain. The former administration, pledged to subjugation without concession, gave place to that of a more liberal party, committed long in advance to a policy of reform involving the wider principle of home rule for Cuba and Puerto Rico.

The overtures of this Government, made through its new envoy, General Woodford, and looking to an immediate and effective amelioration of the condition of the island, although not accepted to the extent of admitted mediation in any shape, were met by assurances that home rule in an advanced phase would be forthwith offered to Cuba, without waiting for the war to end, and that more humane methods should thenceforth prevail in the conduct of hostilities. Coincidentally with these declarations the new Government of Spain continued and completed the policy already begun by its predecessor, of testifying friendly regard for this nation by releasing American citizens held under one charge or another connected with the insurrection, so that by the end of November not a single person entitled in any way to our national protection remained in a Spanish prison.

While these negotiations were in progress the increasing destitution of the unfortunate reconcentrados and the alarming mortality among them claimed earnest attention. The success which had attended the limited measure of relief extended to the suffering American citizens among them by the judicious expenditure through the consular agencies of the money appropriated expressly for their succor by the joint resolution approved May 24, 1897, prompted the humane extension of a similar scheme of aid to the great body of sufferers. A suggestion to this end was acquiesced in by the Spanish authorities. On the 24th of December last I caused to be issued an appeal to the American people inviting contributions in money or in kind for the succor of the starving sufferers in Cuba, following this on the 8th of January by a similar public announcement of the formation of a central Cuban relief committee, with headquarters in New York City, composed of three members representing the American National Red Cross and the religious and business elements of the community.

The efforts of that committee have been untiring and have accomplished much. Arrangements for free transportation to Cuba have greatly aided the charitable work. The president of the American Red Cross and representatives of other contributory organizations have generously visited Cuba and cooperated with the consul-general and the local authorities to make effective distribution of the relief collected through the efforts of the central committee. Nearly $200,000 in money and supplies has already reached the sufferers and more is forthcoming. The supplies are admitted duty free, and transportation to the interior has been arranged, so that the relief, at first necessarily confined to Havana and the larger cities, is now extended through most, if not all, of the towns where suffering exists.

Thousands of lives have already been saved. The necessity for a change in the condition of the reconcentrados is recognized by the Spanish Government. Within a few days past the orders of General Weyler have been revoked; the reconcentrados, it is said, are to be permitted to return to their homes and aided to resume the self-supporting pursuits of peace. Public works have been ordered to give them employment, and a sum of $600,000 has been appropriated for their relief.

The war in Cuba is of such a nature that short of subjugation or extermination a final military victory for either side seems impracticable. The alternative lies in the physical exhaustion of the one or the other party, or perhaps of both—a condition which in effect ended the ten years' war by the truce of Zanjon. The prospect of such a protraction and conclusion of the present strife is a contingency hardly to be contemplated with equanimity by the civilized world, and least of all by the United States, affected and injured as we are, deeply and intimately, by its very existence.

Realizing this, it appeared to be my duty, in a spirit of true friendliness, no less to Spain than to the Cubans, who have so much to lose by the prolongation of the struggle, to seek to bring about an immediate termination of the war. To this end I submitted, on the 27th ultimo, as a result of much representation and correspondence, through the United States minister at Madrid, propositions to the Spanish Government looking to an armistice until October 1 for the negotiation of peace with the good offices of the President.

In addition, I asked the immediate revocation of the order of reconcentration, so as to permit the people to return to their farms and the needy to be relieved with provisions and supplies from the United States, cooperating with the Spanish authorities, so as to afford full relief.

The reply of the Spanish cabinet was received on the night of the 31st ultimo. It offered, as the means to bring about peace in Cuba, to confide the preparation thereof to the insular parliament, inasmuch as the concurrence of that body would be necessary to reach a final result, it being, however, understood that the powers reserved by the constitution to the Central Government are not lessened or diminished. As the Cuban parliament does not meet until the 4th of May next, the Spanish Government would not object, for its part, to accept at once a suspension of hostilities if asked for by the insurgents from the general in chief, to whom it would pertain, in such case, to determine the duration and conditions of the armistice.

The propositions submitted by General Woodford and the reply of the Spanish Government were both in the form of brief memoranda, the texts of which are before me, and are substantially in the language above given. The function of the Cuban parliament in the matter of "preparing" peace and the manner of its doing so are not expressed in the Spanish memorandum; but from General Woodford's explanatory reports of preliminary discussions preceding the final conference it is understood that the Spanish Government stands ready to give the insular congress full powers to settle the terms of peace with the insurgents—whether by direct negotiation or indirectly by means of legislation does not appear.

With this last overture in the direction of immediate peace, and its disappointing reception by Spain, the Executive is brought to the end of his effort.

In my annual message of December last I said:

> Of the untried measures there remain only: Recognition of the insurgents as belligerents; recognition of the independence of Cuba; neutral intervention to end the war by imposing a rational compromise between the contestants, and intervention in favor of one or the other party. I speak not of forcible annexation, for that can not be thought of. That, by our code of morality, would be criminal aggression.

Thereupon I reviewed these alternatives, in the light of President Grant's measured words, uttered in 1875, when after seven years of sanguinary, destructive, and cruel hostilities in Cuba he reached the conclusion that the recognition of the independence of Cuba was impracticable and indefensible; and that the recognition of belligerence was not warranted by the facts according to the tests of public law. I commented especially upon the latter aspect of the question, pointing out the inconveniences and positive dangers of a recognition of belligerence which, while adding to the already onerous burdens of neutrality within our own jurisdiction, could not in any way extend our influence or effective offices in the territory of hostilities.

Nothing has since occurred to change my view in this regard; and I recognize as fully now as then that the issuance of a proclamation of neutrality, by which process the so-called recognition of belligerents is published, could, of itself and unattended by other action, accomplish nothing toward the one end for which we labor—the instant pacification of Cuba and the cessation of the misery that afflicts the island.

Turning to the question of recognizing at this time the independence of the present insurgent government in Cuba, we find safe precedents in our history from an early day. They are well summed up in President Jackson's message to Congress, December 21, 1836, on the subject of the recognition of the independence of Texas. He said:

> In all the contests that have arisen out of the revolutions of France, out of the disputes relating to the Crowns of Portugal and Spain, out of the separation of the American possessions of both from the European Governments, and out of the numerous and constantly occurring struggles for dominion in Spanish America, so wisely consistent with our just principles has been the action of our Government that we have, under the most critical circumstances, avoided all censure, and encountered no other evil than that produced by a transient estrangement of good will in those against whom we have been by force of evidence compelled to decide.
> It has thus made known to the world that the uniform policy and practice of the United States is to avoid all interference in disputes which merely relate to the internal government of other nations, and eventually to recognize the authority of the prevailing party without reference to our particular interests and views or to the merits of the original controversy.
> * * * But on this, as on every other trying occasion, safety is to be found in a rigid adherence to principle.
> In the contest between Spain and the revolted colonies we stood aloof, and waited not only until the ability of the new States to protect themselves was fully established, but until the danger of their being again subjugated had entirely passed away. Then, and not until then, were they recognized.
> Such was our course in regard to Mexico herself. * * * It is true that with regard to Texas the civil authority of Mexico has been expelled, its invading army defeated, the chief of the Republic himself captured, and all present power to control the newly organized government of Texas annihilated within its confines; but, on the other hand, there is, in appearance at least, an immense disparity of physical force on the side of Texas. The Mexican Republic, under another Executive, is rallying its forces under a new leader and menacing a fresh invasion to recover its lost dominion.
> Upon the issue of this threatened invasion the independence of Texas may be considered as suspended; and were there nothing peculiar in the relative situation of the United States and Texas, our acknowledgment of its independence at such a crisis could scarcely be regarded as consistent with that prudent reserve with which we have hitherto held ourselves bound to treat all similar questions.

Thereupon Andrew Jackson proceeded to consider the risk that there might be imputed to the United States motives of selfish interest in view of the former claim on our part to the territory of Texas, and of the avowed purpose of the Texans in seeking recognition of independence as an incident to the incorporation of Texas in the Union, concluding thus:

> Prudence, therefore, seems to dictate that we should still stand aloof and maintain our present attitude, if not until Mexico itself or one of the great foreign powers shall recognize the independence of the new government, at least until the lapse of time or the course of events shall have proved beyond cavil or dispute the ability of the people of that country to maintain their separate sovereignty and to uphold the government constituted by them. Neither of the contending parties can justly complain of this course. By pursuing it we are but carrying out the long-established policy of our Government, a policy which has secured to us respect and influence abroad and inspired confidence at home.

These are the words of the resolute and patriotic Jackson. They are evidence that the United States, in addition to the test imposed by public law as the condition of the recognition of independence by a neutral state (to wit, that the revolted state shall "constitute in fact a body politic, having a government in substance as well as in name, possessed of the elements of stability," and forming de facto, "if left to itself, a state among the nations, reasonably capable of discharging the duties of a state"), has imposed for its own governance in dealing with cases like these the further condition that recognition of independent statehood is not due to a revolted dependency until the danger of its being again subjugated by the parent state has entirely passed away.

This extreme test was, in fact, applied in the case of Texas. The Congress to whom President Jackson referred the question as one "probably leading to war," and therefore a proper subject for "a previous understanding with that body by whom war can alone be declared and by whom all the provisions for sustaining its perils must be furnished," left the matter of the recognition of Texas to the discretion of the Executive, providing merely for the sending of a diplomatic agent when the President should be satisfied that the Republic of Texas had become "an independent State." It was so recognized by President Van Buren, who commissioned a chargé d'affaires March 7, 1837, after Mexico had abandoned an attempt to reconquer the Texan territory, and when there was at the time no bona fide contest going on between the insurgent Province and its former Sovereign.

I said in my message of December last, "It is to be seriously considered whether the Cuban insurrection possesses beyond dispute the attributes of statehood which alone can demand the recognition of belligerency in its favor." The same requirement must certainly be no less seriously considered when the graver issue of recognizing independence is in question, for no less positive test can be applied to the greater act than to the lesser; while, on the other hand, the influences and consequences of the struggle upon the internal policy of the recognizing State, which form important factors when the recognition of belligerency is concerned, are secondary, if not rightly eliminable, factors when the real question is whether the community claiming recognition is or is not independent beyond peradventure.

Nor from the standpoint of expediency do I think it would be wise or prudent for this Government to recognize at the present time the independence of the so-called Cuban Republic. Such recognition is not necessary in order to enable the United States to intervene and pacify the island. To commit this country now to the recognition of any particular government in Cuba might subject us to embarrassing conditions of international obligation toward the organization so recognized. In case of intervention our conduct would be subject to the approval or disapproval of such government. We would be required to submit to its direction and to assume to it the mere relation of a friendly ally.

When it shall appear hereafter that there is within the island a government capable of performing the duties and discharging the functions of a separate nation, and having, as a matter of fact, the proper forms and attributes of nationality, such government can be promptly and readily recognized and the relations and interests of the United States with such nation adjusted.

There remain the alternative forms of intervention to end the war, either as an impartial neutral by imposing a rational compromise between the contestants, or as the active ally of the one party or the other.

As to the first, it is not to be forgotten that during the last few months the relation of the United States has virtually been one of friendly intervention in many ways, each not of itself conclusive, but all tending to the exertion of a potential influence toward an ultimate pacific result, just and honorable to all interests concerned. The spirit of all our acts hitherto has been an earnest, unselfish desire for peace and prosperity in Cuba, untarnished by differences between us and Spain, and unstained by the blood of American citizens.

The forcible intervention of the United States as a neutral to stop the war, according to the large dictates of humanity and following many historical precedents where neighboring states have interfered to check the hopeless sacrifices of life by internecine conflicts beyond their borders, is justifiable on rational grounds. It involves, however, hostile constraint upon both the parties to the contest as well to enforce a truce as to guide the eventual settlement.

The grounds for such intervention may be briefly summarized as follows:

First. In the cause of humanity and to put an end to the barbarities, bloodshed, starvation, and horrible miseries now existing there, and which the parties to the conflict are either unable or unwilling to stop or mitigate. It is no answer to say this is all in another country, belonging to another nation, and is therefore none of our business. It is specially our duty, for it is right at our door.

Second. We owe it to our citizens in Cuba to afford them that protection and indemnity for life and property which no government there can or will afford, and to that end to terminate the conditions that deprive them of legal protection.

Third. The right to intervene may be justified by the very serious injury to the commerce, trade, and business of our people and by the wanton destruction of property and devastation of the island.

Fourth, and which is of the utmost importance. The present condition of affairs in Cuba is a constant menace to our peace, and entails upon this Government an enormous expense. With such a conflict waged for years in an island so near us and with which our people have such trade and business relations—when the lives and liberty of our citizens are in constant danger and their property destroyed and themselves ruined—where our trading vessels are liable to seizure and are seized at our very door by war ships of a foreign nation, the expeditions of filibustering that we are powerless to prevent altogether, and the irritating questions and entanglements thus arising—all these and others that I need not mention, with the resulting strained relations, are a constant menace to our peace, and compel us to keep on a semiwar footing with a nation with which we are at peace.

These elements of danger and disorder already pointed out have been strikingly illustrated by a tragic event which has deeply and justly moved the American people. I have already transmitted to Congress the report of the naval court of inquiry on the destruction of the battle ship Maine in the harbor of Havana during the night of the 15th of February. The destruction of that noble vessel has filled the national heart with inexpressible horror. Two hundred and fifty-eight brave sailors and marines and two officers of our Navy, reposing in the fancied security of a friendly harbor, have been hurled to death, grief and want brought to their homes and sorrow to the nation.

The naval court of inquiry, which, it is needless to say, commands the unqualified confidence of the Government, was unanimous in its conclusion that the destruction of the Maine was caused by an exterior explosion, that of a submarine mine. It did not assume to place the responsibility. That remains to be fixed.

In any event the destruction of the Maine, by whatever exterior cause, is a patent and impressive proof of a state of things in Cuba that is intolerable. That condition is thus shown to be such that the Spanish Government can not assure safety and security to a vessel of the American Navy in the harbor of Havana on a mission of peace, and rightfully there.

Further referring in this connection to recent diplomatic correspondence, a dispatch from our minister to Spain, of the 26th ultimo, contained the statement that the Spanish minister for foreign affairs assured him positively that Spain will do all that the highest honor and justice require in the matter of the Maine. The reply above referred to of the 31st ultimo also contained an expression of the readiness of Spain to submit to an arbitration all the differences which can arise in this matter, which is subsequently explained by the note of the Spanish minister at Washington of the 10th instant, as follows:

> As to the question of fact which springs from the diversity of views between the reports of the American and Spanish boards, Spain proposes that the facts be ascertained by an impartial investigation by experts, whose decision Spain accepts in advance.

To this I have made no reply.

President Grant, in 1875, after discussing the phases of the contest as it then appeared, and its hopeless and apparent indefinite prolongation, said:

> In such event, I am of opinion that other nations will be compelled to assume the responsibility which devolves upon them, and to seriously consider the only remaining measures possible—mediation and intervention. Owing, perhaps, to the large expanse of water separating the island from the Peninsula, * * * the contending parties appear to have within themselves no depository of common confidence, to suggest wisdom when passion and excitement have their sway, and to assume the part of peacemaker.
> In this view in the earlier days of the contest the good offices of the United States as a mediator were tendered in good faith, without any selfish purpose, in the interest of humanity and in sincere friendship for both parties, but were at the time declined by Spain, with the declaration, nevertheless, that at a future time they would be indispensable. No intimation has been received that in the opinion of Spain that time has been reached. And yet the strife continues with all its dread horrors and all its injuries to the interests of the United States and of other nations.
> Each party seems quite capable of working great injury and damage to the other, as well as to all the relations and interests dependent on the existence of peace in the island; but they seem incapable of reaching any adjustment, and both have thus far failed of achieving any success whereby one party shall possess and control the island to the exclusion of the other. Under these circumstances, the agency of others, either by mediation or by intervention, seems to be the only alternative which must sooner or later be invoked for the termination of the strife.

In the last annual message of my immediate predecessor, during the pending struggle, it was said:

> When the inability of Spain to deal successfully with the insurrection has become manifest, and it is demonstrated that her sovereignty is extinct in Cuba for all purposes of its rightful existence, and when a hopeless struggle for its reestablishment has degenerated into a strife which means nothing more than the useless sacrifice of human life and the utter destruction of the very subject-matter of the conflict, a situation will be presented in which our obligations to the sovereignty of Spain will be superseded by higher obligations which we can hardly hesitate to recognize and discharge.

In my annual message to Congress, December last, speaking to this question, I said:

> The near future will demonstrate whether the indispensable condition of a righteous peace, just alike to the Cubans and to Spain, as well as equitable to all our interests so intimately involved in the welfare of Cuba, is likely to be attained. If not, the exigency of further and other action by the United States will remain to be taken. When that time comes that action will be determined in the line of indisputable right and duty. It will be faced, without misgiving or hesitancy, in the light of the obligation this Government owes to itself, to the people who have confided to it the protection of their interests and honor, and to humanity.
> Sure of the right, keeping free from all offense ourselves, actuated only by upright and patriotic considerations, moved neither by passion nor selfishness, the Government will continue its watchful care over the rights and property of American citizens and will abate none of its efforts to bring about by peaceful agencies a peace which shall be honorable and enduring. If it shall hereafter appear to be a duty imposed by our obligations to ourselves, to civilization and humanity to intervene with force, it shall be without fault on our part and only because the necessity for such action will be so clear as to command the support and approval of the civilized world.

The long trial has proved that the object for which Spain has waged the war can not be attained. The fire of insurrection may flame or may smolder with varying seasons, but it has not been and it is plain that it can not be extinguished by present methods. The only hope of relief and repose from a condition which can no longer be endured is the enforced pacification of Cuba. In the name of humanity, in the name of civilization, in behalf of endangered American interests which give us the right and the duty to speak and to act, the war in Cuba must stop.

In view of these facts and of these considerations, I ask the Congress to authorize and empower the President to take measures to secure a full and final termination of hostilities between the Government of Spain and the people of Cuba, and to secure in the island the establishment of a stable government, capable of maintaining order and observing its international obligations, insuring peace and tranquility and the security of its citizens as well as our own, and to use the military and naval forces of the United States as may be necessary for these purposes.

And in the interest of humanity and to aid in preserving the lives of the starving people of the island I recommend that the distribution of food and supplies be continued, and that an appropriation be made out of the public Treasury to supplement the charity of our citizens.

The issue is now with the Congress. It is a solemn responsibility. I have exhausted every effort to relieve the intolerable condition of affairs which is at our doors. Prepared to execute every obligation imposed upon me by the Constitution and the law, I await your action.

Yesterday, and since the preparation of the foregoing message, official information was received by me that the latest decree of the Queen Regent of Spain directs General Blanco, in order to prepare and facilitate peace, to proclaim a suspension of hostilities, the duration and details of which have not yet been communicated to me.

This fact with every other pertinent consideration will, I am sure, have your just and careful attention in the solemn deliberations upon which you are about to enter. If this measure attains a successful result, then our aspirations as a Christian, peace-loving people will be realized. If it fails, it will be only another justification for our contemplated action.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 11, 1898.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the message of the President, together with the accompanying documents, be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss this question at this time, but such a new phase of it has been presented by the message of the President that I think some public discussion ought to be had before it is referred to the committee.

Intervention in Cuba without the invitation of either party and without the recognition of the belligerent rights of the Cubans looks like a war of conquest. It would be difficult to find a precedent for such intervention outside of the conquest of Egypt or the dividing up of China among the great powers of Europe.

The intervention which most attracted the attention of the world, and which received the commendation of all good men, was the intervention of the powers to protect the struggling people of Greece. Greece had hardly the shadow of a government. The Turks were literally destroying them. They were unable to resist, and were about to be exterminated, when the powers intervened in behalf of Greece and enabled her to form an independent Government. That action was universally approved, and is cited as a precedent for such a case as is presented by the conditions in Cuba.

At the time of our Revolution, France practically intervened in our behalf. It was not suggested that her forces should be used to end the rebellion, take possession of the country, and dictate to the patriots of the Revolution.

There is nothing in the condition of Cuba as set forth in the President's message to form a shadow of an excuse for using armed force against the insurgents, by intervention against Spain and the armies of the patriots in the field. Recognition of the rights of the Cubans must precede intervention, or the United States will be placed in the position of a filibuster, prosecuting war for conquest.

On the 28th of February, 1896, the Senate passed, by a vote of 64 to 6, the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the opinion of Congress, a condition of public war exists between the Government of Spain and the Government proclaimed and for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba; and that the United States of America should maintain a strict neutrality between the contending powers, according to each all the rights of belligerents in the ports and territory of the United States.

Resolved further, That the friendly offices of the United States should be offered by the President to the Spanish Government for the recognition of the independence of Cuba.

On the 6th of April, 1896, the House of Representatives passed that same resolution by a vote of 246 to 27. Before the passage of that resolution the subject of acknowledging the belligerent rights of the Cubans was very elaborately discussed by the learned lawyers of both Houses of Congress, and the conclusion at which Congress then arrived was very deliberately made. There was nearly a year of discussion, and what has occurred since has tended very strongly to confirm the opinion which Congress then entertained.

The Republican convention, which met in July following the passage of this resolution, took substantially the same view of the question. It declared:

From the hour of achieving their own independence, the people of the United States have regarded with sympathy the struggles of other American peoples to free themselves from European domination. We watch with deep and abiding interest the heroic battle of the Cuban patriots against cruelty and oppression, and our best hopes go out for the full success of their determined contest for liberty.

The Government of Spain, having lost control of Cuba, and being unable to protect the property or lives of resident American citizens, or to comply with its treaty obligations, we believe that the Government of the United States should actively use its influence and good offices to restore peace and give independence to the island.

"Restore peace and give independence to the island!" That was the sentiment of the country then, and it has been the sentiment of the country ever since. What has occurred since the meeting of that convention to change the conditions? The "incidents" which have occurred since—they are called "incidents"—demand in the most urgent manner prompt action on the part of the United States.

The battle ship Maine was blown up by Spain in Havana Harbor. That was an act of war. If a person should put a torpedo under this Capitol, if that torpedo should explode, and if we knew who put it there, would we hold the person harmless, even if we did not see who fired the torpedo? Would we think further investigation was necessary to establish the guilt of the person who planted the torpedo and laid the train? Would we discharge that person on the supposition that he had an accomplice and we could not ascertain who his accomplice was?

The blowing up of the Maine is a parallel case. Spain placed the Maine over a torpedo, over a mine, which was a Spanish mine. She knew where it was; and that makes the case. War with Spain for the blowing up of the Maine would be a war about which we need not invite a consultation or ask the advice of Europe. The President, however, does not invite our attention to the consideration of war in consequence of the act of Spain in blowing up the Maine, but the people do.

Passing that by, it was suggested that we had reasons to interfere in behalf of humanity; on account of the cruel starvation of the people of Cuba; on account of the murder of them by hundreds of thousands. The President presented that case to Spain. Spain recognized the injustice and the cruelty of it in words, and appropriated $600,000 for the relief of the reconcentrados. She said she was willing to cooperate with us in mitigating the atrocities she had committed upon the noncombatants of Cuba. She repealed the order which confined the reconcentrados in cities to starve and die. When that was done, that cause of war was substantially removed.

Intervention amongst nations occurs for three reasons: One for conquest, one to stop extreme cruelties, and the other to help one side or the other. We have a right to intervene if Spain asks us to do so; we have a right to intervene if the existing Cuban Government asks us to do so; and we may have a duty to intervene when the Cuban Government needs such intervention. That occurs sometimes; and of such interventions the world has always approved; but the justice of an intervention for conquest is never admitted. Under the law of nations intervention for conquest is condemned, and is opposed to the universal sentiment of mankind. It is unjust, it is robbery, to intervene for conquest. In this case there can not now be intervention for the sake of humanity, because Spain is willing and promises that she will do all she can to relieve the suffering.

If it is intervention against Spain and against Cuba, how is it to terminate? What will be the obligations of the parties when the war ceases? If we enter upon this war without having the Cuban patriots as our allies, we shall have a great war on our hands, and the rainy season and the yellow fever would make it impossible for our soldiers to live in Cuba. It is impossible for the Spanish soldiers to fight there during the rainy season, but the Cubans, being acclimated and being trained soldiers, having been in the field for years, can carry on war. If we interfere in their behalf, we need to send no soldiers there. All we will have to do will be to send arms, ammunition, and food, and the Spaniards will be compelled to leave the Island of Cuba. If we do not want to intervene at all, if we want to do what Congress advised two years ago—acknowledge the belligerent rights of the Cubans—they will take care of themselves, and Cuba will be lost to Spain.

If we intervene and take possession of the country, what are we going to do with it? However, if we declare war against Spain on account of the destruction of the Maine, we would incur no responsibility after the termination of the war. A war with Spain, having the Cubans for allies, would be approved by all liberty-loving people in the land; a war to set them free would be hailed with the same acclaim of approval as was the war against Turkey to liberate Greece. It would be regarded by liberty-loving men as favorably as was the aid which France gave us in securing our liberty. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. STEWART. The spirit of the American people was expressed in that resolution of the Republican party, and with more accuracy than I have ever seen it expressed elsewhere. It was in exact accord with the feeling of our people. I remember, on reading that resolution, I said, "The Republican party have now reached the heart of the American people;" and that was the case throughout the entire campaign. A war in aid of liberty is a war in which the American people are willing to engage. A war to avenge the destruction of the Maine will be approved throughout the land. I believe we ought to hold Spain responsible for that act. But a war against both parties in Cuba and taking possession of the island is another thing. What will you do with the island when you take it? There is some talk about responsibility. As I read international law, the responsibility upon us would be very great if we should take the island.

When a country is divided, the two sections of it are equally responsible for its debt. Some authorities say that the debt should be divided between them pro rata, and some even go so far as to say that each is responsible for the entire debt of a government when a country is divided. But when the Cubans make war for liberty, for independence, and a debt is incurred to subdue them, or a debt is incurred to suppress a rebellion which finally succeeds, the new government is freed from all liability for such debt. That is the law of nations, which a great nation like ours would obey. If we intervene in Cuba and take possession of the island, we can not liberate it from the lien which the bondholders have upon it. It is a mortgaged country. Our interference will not be paramount to the mortgage under international law, but the right to liberty and independence, for which the Cubans have fought, is paramount to a mortgage made to obtain money to subdue them. A mortgage on a country to hold a people in subjection is not an obligation resting upon an independent state when it secures its liberty.

I hope there will be no intervention that does not recognize the right of the Cubans. In all the wars of all the ages there never has been more persistent heroism displayed than has been displayed in the last fifty years in Cuba. Whatever we may do now, the name of Gomez will be honored and prized by all liberty-loving men throughout the world. He has stood firm and said nothing to compromise his people; he has done nothing that was not lofty and patriotic; and those people have endured privations in the conduct of the war the like of which have not a parallel in history.

Shall we say that we will not recognize the patriots of Cuba; that we will make war to take possession of the island without their consent? If we do, they will not be our allies. If they are not our allies, and we must fight them and Spain together in the sickly, yellow-fever season, we will have to sacrifice hundreds of thousands of our best people. On the contrary, if they are our allies, we need not send a soldier to Cuba, for the Cubans will have plenty of soldiers to drive the Spaniards out. If we will acknowledge their independence and remain neutral, the Cuban patriots will gain their liberty without our aid.

The Secretary of the Treasury tells us that we have spent millions in policing the ocean to blockade Cuba and prevent munitions of war and supplies from being landed on the island. When I read that I asked myself were we entirely blameless for the starvation of hundreds of thousands of the noncombatants of Cuba. If we had not blockaded the country it might have been impossible for Spain to have carried on a war of extermination by starvation. We have, besides that, used the entire power of the Government to hunt down every person who attempted to give aid of any kind to Cuba. All this has been done year after year, and still Spain is powerless to subjugate the island.

Let us at least be neutral. The time has now arrived for dissolving our alliance with Spain—an alliance which never ought to have been made. Let Cuba buy supplies in our markets upon the same terms and conditions as Spain does, and let her get them to the island without interference from our revenue cutters. Let us remove our blockade, and food and munitions of war will find their way to the struggling Cubans and Cuba will soon be free; but do not for one moment contemplate a war against the patriots for whom the people of the United States have so strong a sympathy. Our whole people sympathize with the struggle for liberty which the Cubans have made, and war on them or interference with them without their consent will be condemned by the American people.

I hope the Committee on Foreign Relations will consider the subject well, and deliberate long before it recommends this new departure suggested by the message of the President.

Mr. DANIEL. Is debate in order, Mr. President?

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I trust the question upon the motion to refer the message of the President may be taken without further debate. The business with which the Committee on Foreign Relations is charged will doubtless be much expedited thereby.

Mr. MASON. I am perfectly satisfied with the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, but I simply wish to give notice that I shall desire about ten minutes of time, either at some time during to-day or to-morrow, to bring to the attention of the committee before their final report some of the precedents, and what I think are the established rules of international law. I desire to present them, at the proper time, as arguments in favor of the recognition of the independence of Cuba.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I do not intend to speak at length to-day. I rise to introduce a joint resolution which expresses my views of what duty, honor, and patriotism demands of us as a nation; and in introducing it I want to say that I am greatly disappointed, to say the least, at the message of the President which has just been read. In great suspense the American people have waited for this message, and when they read it they will be more than disappointed. That message does not mean the independence of Cuba. The message means, if it means anything, that the President asks Congress to authorize him to make the Cubans stop fighting for their liberty and surrender to the cruel rule of Spain and the greedy demands of bondholders. He asks that we authorize him to intervene to stop the war. The war can not be stopped, Mr. President, until Cuba is free and the Spanish flag goes off from Cuban soil; the Cubans will never submit to anything else, and every American patriot ought to glory in their courage and bravery and pluck. If we favor this course, then let us recognize the independence of Cuba. There is but one other way to stop the war, and that is for the United States to help Spain to crush the Cuban patriots. Shall we permit the President to take that course?

Shall Congress and the country permit our Army and Navy to be used to help Spain further to force autonomy fraud upon the struggling Cubans and take from them that liberty which they have already won? If we do, shame upon us! Shall we sit two months after our vessel and our sailors have been destroyed by Spain and refer to the outrage and the crime as an "incident" and talk of arbitration?

No, Mr. President, the stock jobbers and the bond sharks have not yet crushed out American manhood and patriotism. Before such a monstrous, humiliating proposition can be put through Congress the American people shall be heard from; and, Mr. President, when they are, then the Maine will be avenged and Cuba will be free.

Mr. President, I shall have something further to say hereafter. I will withhold further remarks now and let the motion of the Senator from Minnesota be put.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], that the message of the President, with the accompanying documents, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

INDEPENDENCE OF CUBA.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the joint resolution which I offer be now read as part of my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution (S. R. 142) for the recognition of the independence of the Republic of Cuba was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the destruction of the U. S. battle ship Maine and the murdering of 266 of our sailors in Havana Harbor by the Spanish Government is an act of war on the part of Spain against the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, First. That to avenge this most foul and unparalleled crime, which our national honor demands, and to put a stop to Spain's most cruel, barbarous, and inhuman warfare now being waged against Cuba, which is demanded in the interest of liberty and humanity, that the Government of the United States hereby recognizes the Cuban Republic as a separate and independent nation.

Second. That the Government of the United States hereby demands that Spain at once withdraw her land and naval forces from Cuba.

Third. That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, empowered, and directed to use, if necessary, the entire land and naval force of the United States to carry these resolutions into effect.

Mr. BUTLER. These resolutions express my feelings and sentiments, and I believe that they express the feelings and sentiments of the American people. The crime of February 15 must be avenged by Cuban independence!

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 8875) to amend an act entitled, "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Yazoo River at or near the city of Greenwood, in Leflore County, in the State of Mississippi;" in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

AFFAIRS IN CUBA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. DAVIS, referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith, in response to a resolution of the Senate of the 14th of February last, calling for information and correspondence in regard to the condition of the Island of Cuba and to negotiations for commercial relations between the United States and that island, a report of the Secretary of State, with its accompanying correspondence, covering the first inquiry of the resolution, together with a report of the special commissioner plenipotentiary charged with commercial negotiations under the provisions of the tariff act approved July 24, 1897, in response to the second inquiry.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, April 11, 1898.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 12, 1898, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 11, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration—this being District day—the bill H. R. 9205.

Mr. ROYSE. Mr. Speaker, I had already given notice that I intended to call up to-day the election case of Fairchild against Ward.

I would like to inquire how long the gentleman from Wisconsin thinks this matter will take for consideration?

Mr. BABCOCK. Not more, I think, than fifteen or twenty minutes. I know of no reason why it should exceed that length of time.

Mr. ROYSE. I should not like to yield unless I was absolutely certain that the gentleman would be willing to give up the floor at that time.

Mr. BABCOCK. It is, of course, impossible to be absolutely certain as to the time. That is my impression, however. I know of no opposition to these measures, and we have but two bills to bring forward to-day.

Mr. ROYSE. And the gentleman is not able to state definitely how long it will take to consider them?

Mr. BABCOCK. I am not able to do so. It would be utterly impossible. In my best judgment it will take less than a half hour.

Mr. ROYSE. If the gentleman can assure me he will complete the consideration of them within a half hour, or about that, I am willing to yield for that length of time. Otherwise I do not want this case to go over.

Mr. BABCOCK. It is impossible for me to say. I think this business will be concluded within fifteen minutes. But, of course, that is only my individual opinion.

Mr. ROYSE. What is the character of the bills the gentleman desires to call up to-day?

Mr. BABCOCK. The bill (H. R. 9205) is a bill for the extension of the Columbia Railroad, a matter agreed on by all; and the other is the Episcopal Church charter.

Mr. ROYSE. I doubt whether it is better to yield under the circumstances. It may take an hour or over to get through with those bills.

I think, Mr. Speaker, I will have to insist on taking up the election case.

Mr. BABCOCK. Then, Mr. Speaker, this being District day, I must raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the election case called up by the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contested-election case—Ben L. Fairchild vs. William L. Ward.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin raises the question of consideration.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that in the opinion of the Chair the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. ROYSE demanded a division.

The question was taken on a division; and there were—ayes 154, noes 110.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROYSE. Mr. Speaker——

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that this matter be left pending until after the message is received.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the message will be submitted to the House at this time.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, by instructions of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I ask permission of the House that the committee have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit that question after the message has been read.

The Chair hopes the House will be in order, and that those in the galleries will refrain from any expressions of sentiment; and further, that perfect order may be maintained both on the floor and in the galleries during the reading of the message.

CUBAN AFFAIRS.

The following message from the President of the United States was read, and, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

To the Congress of the United States:

Obedient to that precept of the Constitution which commands the President to give from time to time to the Congress information of the state of the Union and to recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient, it becomes my duty now to address your body with regard to the grave crisis that has arisen in the relations of the United States to Spain by reason of the warfare that for more than three years has raged in the neighboring Island of Cuba.

I do so because of the intimate connection of the Cuban question with the state of our own Union and the grave relation the course which it is now incumbent upon the nation to adopt must needs bear to the traditional policy of our Government if it is to accord with the precepts laid down by the founders of the Republic and religiously observed by succeeding Administrations to the present day.

The present revolution is but the successor of other similar insurrections which have occurred in Cuba against the dominion of Spain, extending over a period of nearly half a century, each of which during its progress has subjected the United States to great effort and expense in enforcing its neutrality laws, caused enormous losses to American trade and commerce, caused irritation, annoyance, and disturbance among our citizens, and, by the exercise of cruel, barbarous, and uncivilized practices of warfare, shocked the sensibilities and offended the humane sympathies of our people.

Since the present revolution began in February, 1895, this country has seen the fertile domain at our theshold ravaged by fire and sword in the course of a struggle unequaled in the history of the island and rarely paralleled as to the numbers of the cambatants and the bitterness of the contest by any revolution of modern times where a dependent people striving to be free have been opposed by the power of the sovereign state.

Our people have beheld a once prosperous community reduced to comparative want, its lucrative commerce virtually paralyzed, its exceptional productiveness diminished, its fields laid waste, its mills in ruins, and its people perishing by tens of thousands from hunger and destitution. We have found ourselves constrained, in the observance of that strict neutrality which our laws enjoin, and which the law of nations commands, to police our own waters and watch our own seaports in prevention of any unlawful act in aid of the Cubans.

Our trade has suffered, the capital invested by our citizens in Cuba has been largely lost, and the temper and forbearance of our people have been so sorely tried as to beget a perilous unrest among our own citizens which has inevitably found its expression from time to time in the National Legislature, so that issues wholly external to our own body politic engross attention and stand in the way of that close devotion to domestic advancement that becomes a self-contained commonwealth whose primal maxim has been the avoidance of all foreign entanglements. All this must needs awaken, and has, indeed, aroused the utmost concern on the part of this Government, as well during my predecessor's term as in my own.

In April, 1896, the evils from which our country suffered through the Cuban war became so onerous that my predecessor made an effort to bring about a peace through the mediation of this Government in any way that might tend to an honorable adjustment of the contest between Spain and her revolted colony on the basis of some effective scheme of self-government for Cuba under the flag and sovereignty of Spain. It failed through the refusal of the Spanish Government then in power to consider any form of mediation or, indeed, any plan of settlement which did not begin with the actual submission of the insurgents to the mother country, and then only on such terms as Spain herself might see fit to grant. The war continued unabated. The resistance of the insurgents was in no wise diminished.

The efforts of Spain were increased, both by the dispatch of fresh levies to Cuba and by the addition to the horrors of the strife of a new and inhuman phase happily unprecedented in the modern history of civilized Christian peoples. The policy of devastation and concentration inaugurated by the Captain-General's bando of October 21, 1896, in the Province of Pinar del Rio, was thence extended to embrace all of the island to which the power of the Spanish arms was able to reach by occupation or by military operations. The peasantry, including all dwelling in the open agricultural interior, were driven into the garrison towns or isolated places held by the troops.

The raising and movement of provisions of all kinds were interdicted. The fields were laid waste, dwellings unroofed and fired, mills destroyed, and, in short, everything that could desolate the land and render it unfit for human habitation or support was commanded by one or the other of the contending parties and executed by all the powers at their disposal.

By the time the present Administration took office a year ago reconcentration, so called, had been made effective over the better part of the four central and western provinces—Santa Clara, Matanzas, Havana, and Pinar del Rio.

The agricultural population to the estimated number of 300,000 or more was herded within the towns and their immediate vicinage, deprived of the means of support, rendered destitute of shelter, left poorly clad, and exposed to the most unsanitary conditions. As the scarcity of food increased with the devastation of the depopulated areas of production, destitution and want became misery and starvation. Month by month the death rate increased in an alarming ratio. By March, 1897, according to conservative estimates from official Spanish sources, the mortality among the reconcentrados from starvation and the diseases thereto incident exceeded 50 per cent of their total number.

No practical relief was accorded to the destitute. The overburdened towns, already suffering from the general dearth, could give no aid. So-called "zones of cultivation" established within the immediate areas of effective military control about the cities and fortified camps proved illusory as a remedy for the suffering. The unfortunates, being for the most part women and children, with aged and helpless men, enfeebled by disease and hunger, could not have tilled the soil without tools, seed, or shelter for their own support or for the supply of the cities. Reconcentration, adopted avowedly as a war measure in order to cut off the resources of the insurgents, worked its predestined result. As I said in my message of last December, it was not civilized warfare; it was extermination. The only peace it could beget was that of the wilderness and the grave.

Meanwhile the military situation in the island had undergone a noticeable change. The extraordinary activity that characterized the second year of the war, when the insurgents invaded even the thitherto unharmed fields of Pinar del Rio and carried havoc and destruction up to the walls of the city of Havana itself, had relapsed into a dogged struggle in the central and eastern provinces. The Spanish arms regained a measure of control in Pinar del Rio and parts of Havana, but, under the existing conditions of the rural country, without immediate improvement of their productive situation. Even thus partially restricted, the revolutionists held their own, and their conquest and submission, put forward by Spain as the essential and sole basis of peace, seemed as far distant as at the outset.

In this state of affairs my Administration found itself confronted with the grave problem of its duty. My message of last December reviewed the situation and narrated the steps taken with a view to relieving its acuteness and opening the way to some form of honorable settlement. The assassination of the prime minister, Canovas, led to a change of government in Spain. The former administration, pledged to subjugation without concession, gave place to that of a more liberal party, committed long in advance to a policy of reform involving the wider principle of home rule for Cuba and Puerto Rico.

The overtures of this Government, made through its new envoy, General Woodford and looking to an immediate and effective amelioration of the condition of the island, although not accepted to the extent of admitted mediation in any shape, were met by assurances that home rule, in an advanced phase, would be forthwith offered to Cuba, without waiting for the war to end, and that more humane methods should thenceforth prevail in the conduct of hostilities. Coincidentally with these declarations, the new government of Spain continued and completed the policy already begun by its predecessor, of testifying friendly regard for this nation by releasing American citizens held under one charge or another connected with the insurrection, so that, by the end of November, not a single person entitled in any way to our national protection remained in a Spanish prison.

While these negotiations were in progress the increasing destitution of the unfortunate reconcentrados and the alarming mortality among them claimed earnest attention. The success which had attended the limited measure of relief extended to the suffering American citizens among them by the judicious expenditure through the consular agencies of the money appropriated expressly for their succor by the joint resolution approved May 24, 1897, prompted the humane extension of a similar scheme of aid to the great body of sufferers. A suggestion to this end was acquiesced in by the Spanish authorities. On the 24th of December last, I caused to be issued an appeal to the American people, inviting contributions in money or in kind for the succor of the starving sufferers in Cuba, following this on the 8th of January by a similar public announcement of the formation of a central Cuban relief committee, with headquarters in New York City, composed of three members representing the American National Red Cross and the religious and business elements of the community.

The efforts of that committee have been untiring and have accomplished much. Arrangements for free transportation to Cuba have greatly aided the charitable work. The president of the American Red Cross and representatives of other contributory organizations have generously visited Cuba and cooperated with the consul-general and the local authorities to make effective distribution of the relief collected through the efforts of the central committee. Nearly $200,000 in money and supplies has already reached the sufferers, and more is forthcoming. The supplies are admitted duty free, and transportation to the interior has been arranged, so that the relief, at first necessarily confined to Havana and the larger cities, is now extended through most if not all the towns where suffering exists.

Thousands of lives have already been saved. The necessity for a change in the condition of the reconcentrados is recognized by the Spanish Government. Within a few days past the orders of General Weyler have been revoked; the reconcentrados, it is said, are to be permitted to return to their homes and aided to resume the self-supporting pursuits of peace. Public works have been ordered to give them employment, and a sum of $600,000 has been appropriated for their relief.

The war in Cuba is of such a nature that short of subjugation or extermination a final military victory for either side seems impracticable. The alternative lies in the physical exhaustion of the one or the other party, or perhaps of both—a condition which in effect ended the ten years' war by the truce of Zanjon. The prospect of such a protraction and conclusion of the present strife is a contingency hardly to be contemplated with equanimity by the civilized world, and least of all by the United States, affected and injured as we are, deeply and intimately, by its very existence.

Realizing this, it appeared to be my duty, in a spirit of true friendliness, no less to Spain than to the Cubans who have so much to lose by the prolongation of the struggle, to seek to bring about an immediate termination of the war. To this end I submitted on the 27th ultimo, as a result of much representation and correspondence, through the United States minister at Madrid, propositions to the Spanish Government looking to an armistice until October 1 for the negotiation of peace with the good offices of the President.

In addition, I asked the immediate revocation of the order of reconcentration, so as to permit the people to return to their farms and the needy to be relieved with provisions and supplies from the United States, cooperating with the Spanish authorities, so as to afford full relief.

The reply of the Spanish cabinet was received on the night of the 31st ultimo. It offered, as the means to bring about peace in Cuba, to confide the preparation thereof to the insular parliament, inasmuch as the concurrence of that body would be necessary to reach a final result, it being, however, understood that the powers reserved by the constitution to the Central Government are not lessened or diminished. As the Cuban parliament does not meet until the 4th of May next, the Spanish Government would not object, for its part, to accept at once a suspension of hostilities if asked for by the insurgents from the general in chief, to whom it would pertain, in such case, to determine the duration and conditions of the armistice.

The propositions submitted by General Woodford and the reply of the Spanish Government were both in the form of brief memoranda, the texts of which are before me, and are substantially in the language above given. The function of the Cuban parliament in the matter of "preparing" peace and the manner of its doing so are not expressed in the Spanish memorandum; but from General Woodford's explanatory reports of preliminary discussions preceding the final conference it is understood that the Spanish Government stands ready to give the insular congress full powers to settle the terms of peace with the insurgents—whether by direct negotiation or indirectly by means of legislation does not appear.

With this last overture in the direction of immediate peace and its disappointing reception by Spain the Executive is brought to the end of his effort.

In my annual message of December last I said:

> Of the untried measures there remain only, recognition of the insurgents as belligerents, recognition of the independence of Cuba, neutral intervention to end the war by imposing a rational compromise between the contestants, and intervention in favor of one or the other party. I speak not of forcible annexation, for that can not be thought of. That, by our code of morality, would be criminal aggression.

Thereupon I reviewed these alternatives in the light of President Grant's measured words, uttered in 1875, when, after seven years of sanguinary, destructive, and cruel hostilities in Cuba, he reached the conclusion that the recognition of the independence of Cuba was impracticable and indefensible, and that the recognition of belligerence was not warranted by the facts according to the tests of public law. I commented especially upon the latter aspect of the question, pointing out the inconveniences and positive dangers of a recognition of belligerence which, while adding to the already onerous burdens of neutrality within our own jurisdiction, could not in any way extend our influence or effective offices in the territory of hostilities.

Nothing has since occurred to change my view in this regard; and I recognize as fully now as then that the issuance of a proclamation of neutrality, by which process the so-called recognition of belligerents is published, could, of itself and unattended by other action, accomplish nothing toward the one end for which we labor—the instant pacification of Cuba and the cessation of the misery that afflicts the island.

Turning to the question of recognizing at this time the independence of the present insurgent government in Cuba, we find safe precedents in our history from an early day. They are well summed up in President Jackson's message to Congress December 21, 1836, on the subject of the recognition of the independence of Texas. He said:

> In all the contests that have arisen out of the revolutions of France, out of the disputes relating to the Crowns of Portugal and Spain, out of the separation of the American possessions of both from the European Governments, and out of the numerous and constantly occurring struggles for dominion in Spanish America so wisely consistent with our just principles has been the action of our Government that we have, under the most critical circumstances, avoided all censure and encountered no other evil than that produced by a transient estrangement of good will in those against whom we have been by force of evidence compelled to decide.
> It has thus made known to the world that the uniform policy and practice of the United States is to avoid all interference in disputes which merely relate to the internal government of other nations, and eventually to recognize the authority of the prevailing party without reference to our particular interests and views or to the merits of the original controversy.
> * * * But on this, as on every other trying occasion, safety is to be found in a rigid adherence to principle.
> In the contest between Spain and the revolted colonies we stood aloof, and waited not only until the ability of the new States to protect themselves was fully established, but until the danger of their being again subjugated had entirely passed away. Then, and not until then, were they recognized.
> Such was our course in regard to Mexico herself. * * * It is true that with regard to Texas the civil authority of Mexico has been expelled, its invading army defeated, the chief of the Republic himself captured, and all present power to control the newly organized government of Texas annihilated within its confines; but, on the other hand, there is in appearance at least, an immense disparity of physical force on the side of Texas. The Mexican Republic, under another executive, is rallying its forces under a new leader and menacing a fresh invasion to recover its lost dominion.
> Upon the issue of this threatened invasion the independence of Texas may be considered as suspended; and were there nothing peculiar in the relative situation of the United States and Texas, our acknowledgment of its independence at such a crisis could scarcely be regarded as consistent with that prudent reserve with which we have hitherto held ourselves bound to treat all similar questions.

Thereupon Andrew Jackson proceeded to consider the risk that there might be imputed to the United States motives of selfish interest in view of the former claim on our part to the territory of Texas and of the avowed purpose of the Texans in seeking recognition of independence as an incident to the incorporation of Texas in the Union, concluding thus:

> Prudence, therefore, seems to dictate that we should still stand aloof and maintain our present attitude, if not until Mexico itself or one of the great foreign powers shall recognize the independence of the new government, at least until the lapse of time or the course of events shall have proved beyond cavil or dispute the ability of the people of that country to maintain their separate sovereignty and to uphold the government constituted by them. Neither of the contending parties can justly complain of this course. By pursuing it we are but carrying out the long-established policy of our Government, a policy which has secured to us respect and influence abroad and inspired confidence at home.

These are the words of the resolute and patriotic Jackson. They are evidence that the United States, in addition to the test imposed by public law as the condition of the recognition of independence by a neutral state (to wit, that the revolted state shall "constitute in fact a body politic, having a government in substance as well as in name, possessed of the elements of stability," and forming de facto, "if left to itself, a state among the nations, reasonably capable of discharging the duties of a state"), has imposed for its own governance in dealing with cases like these the further condition that recognition of independent statehood is not due to a revolted dependency until the danger of its being again subjugated by the parent state has entirely passed away.

This extreme test was, in fact, applied in the case of Texas. The Congress to whom President Jackson referred the question as one "probably leading to war," and therefore a proper subject for "a previous understanding with that body by whom war can alone be declared and by whom all the provisions for sustaining its perils must be furnished," left the matter of the recognition of Texas to the discretion of the Executive, providing merely for the sending of a diplomatic agent when the President should be satisfied that the Republic of Texas had become "an independent State." It was so recognized by President Van Buren, who commissioned a chargé d'affaires March 7, 1837, after Mexico had abandoned an attempt to reconquer the Texan territory, and when there was at the time no bona fide contest going on between the insurgent Province and its former Sovereign.

I said in my message of December last, "It is to be seriously considered whether the Cuban insurrection possesses beyond dispute the attributes of statehood which alone can demand the recognition of belligerency in its favor." The same requirement must certainly be no less seriously considered when the graver issue of recognizing independence is in question, for no less positive test can be applied to the greater act than to the lesser; while, on the other hand, the influences and consequences of the struggle upon the internal policy of the recognizing state, which form important factors when the recognition of belligerency is concerned, are secondary, if not rightly eliminable, factors when the real question is whether the community claiming recognition is or is not independent beyond peradventure.

Nor from the standpoint of expediency do I think it would be wise or prudent for this Government to recognize at the present time the independence of the so-called Cuban Republic. Such recognition is not necessary in order to enable the United States to intervene and pacify the island. To commit this country now to the recognition of any particular government in Cuba might subject us to embarrassing conditions of international obligation toward the organization so recognized. In case of intervention our conduct would be subject to the approval or disapproval of such government. We would be required to submit to its direction and to assume to it the mere relation of a friendly ally.

When it shall appear hereafter that there is within the island a government capable of performing the duties and discharging the functions of a separate nation, and having, as a matter of fact, the proper forms and attributes of nationality, such government can be promptly and readily recognized and the relations and interests of the United States with such nation adjusted.

There remain the alternative forms of intervention to end the war, either as an impartial neutral by imposing a rational compromise between the contestants or as the active ally of the one party or the other.

As to the first, it is not to be forgotten that during the last few months the relation of the United States has virtually been one of friendly intervention in many ways, each not of itself conclusive, but all tending to the exertion of a potential influence toward an ultimate pacific result just and honorable to all interests concerned. The spirit of all our acts hitherto has been an earnest, unselfish desire for peace and prosperity in Cuba untarnished by differences between us and Spain and unstained by the blood of American citizens.

The forcible intervention of the United States as a neutral to stop the war, according to the large dictates of humanity and following many historical precedents where neighboring states have interfered to check the hopeless sacrifices of life by internecine conflicts beyond their borders, is justifiable on rational grounds. It involves, however, hostile constraint upon both the parties to the contest, as well to enforce a truce as to guide the eventual settlement.

First. In the cause of humanity and to put an end to the barbarities, bloodshed, starvation, and horrible miseries now existing there, and which the parties to the conflict are either unable or unwilling to stop or mitigate. It is no answer to say this is all in another country, belonging to another nation, and is therefore none of our business. It is specially our duty, for it is right at our door.

Second. We owe it to our citizens in Cuba to afford them that protection and indemnity for life and property which no government there can or will afford, and to that end to terminate the conditions that deprive them of legal protection.

Third. The right to intervene may be justified by the very serious injury to the commerce, trade, and business of our people and by the wanton destruction of property and devastation of the island.

Fourth, and which is of the utmost importance. The present condition of affairs in Cuba is a constant menace to our peace, and entails upon this Government an enormous expense. With such a conflict waged for years in an island so near us and with which our people have such trade and business relations—when the lives and liberty of our citizens are in constant danger and their property destroyed and themselves ruined—where our trading vessels are liable to seizure and are seized at our very door by war ships of a foreign nation, the expeditions of filibustering that we are powerless to prevent altogether, and the irritating questions and entanglements thus arising—all these and others that I need not mention, with the resulting strained relations, are a constant menace to our peace, and compel us to keep on a semiwar footing with a nation with which we are at peace.

These elements of danger and disorder already pointed out have been strikingly illustrated by a tragic event which has deeply and justly moved the American people. I have already transmitted to Congress the report of the naval court of inquiry on the destruction of the battle ship Maine in the harbor of Havana during the night of the 15th of February. The destruction of that noble vessel has filled the national heart with inexpressible horror. Two hundred and fifty-eight brave sailors and marines and two officers of our Navy, reposing in the fancied security of a friendly harbor, have been hurled to death, grief and want brought to their homes and sorrow to the nation.

The naval court of inquiry, which, it is needless to say, commands the unqualified confidence of the Government, was unanimous in its conclusion that the destruction of the Maine was caused by an exterior explosion, that of a submarine mine. It did not assume to place the responsibility. That remains to be fixed.

In any event the destruction of the Maine, by whatever exterior cause, is a patent and impressive proof of a state of things in Cuba that is intolerable. That condition is thus shown to be such that the Spanish Government can not assure safety and security to a vessel of the American Navy in the harbor of Havana on a mission of peace, and rightfully there.

Further referring in this connection to recent diplomatic correspondence, a dispatch from our minister to Spain, of the 26th ultimo, contained the statement that the Spanish minister for foreign affairs assured him positively that Spain will do all that the highest honor and justice require in the matter of the Maine. The reply above referred to of the 31st ultimo also contained an expression of the readiness of Spain to submit to an arbitration all the differences which can arise in this matter, which is subsequently explained by the note of the Spanish minister at Washington of the 10th instant, as follows:

As to the question of fact which springs from the diversity of views between the reports of the American and Spanish boards, Spain proposes that the facts be ascertained by an impartial investigation by experts, whose decision Spain accepts in advance.

To this I have made no reply.

President Grant, in 1875, after discussing the phases of the contest as it then appeared, and its hopeless and apparent indefinite prolongation, said:

In such event, I am of opinion that other nations will be compelled to assume the responsibility which devolves upon them, and to seriously consider the only remaining measures possible—mediation and intervention. Owing, perhaps, to the large expanse of water separating the island from the Peninsula, * * * the contending parties appear to have within themselves no depository of common confidence, to suggest wisdom when passion and excitement have their sway, and to assume the part of peacemaker.

In this view in the earlier days of the contest the good offices of the United States as a mediator were tendered in good faith, without any selfish purpose, in the interest of humanity and in sincere friendship for both parties, but were at the time declined by Spain, with the declaration, nevertheless, that at a future time they would be indispensable. No intimation has been received that in the opinion of Spain that time has been reached. And yet the strife continues with all its dread horrors and all its injuries to the interests of the United States and of other nations.

Each party seems quite capable of working great injury and damage to the other, as well as to all the relations and interests dependent on the existence of peace in the island; but they seem incapable of reaching any adjustment, and both have thus far failed of achieving any success whereby one party shall possess and control the island to the exclusion of the other. Under these circumstances, the agency of others, either by mediation or by intervention, seems to be the only alternative which must sooner or later be invoked for the termination of the strife.

In the last annual message of my immediate predecessor during the pending struggle, it was said:

When the inability of Spain to deal successfully with the insurrection has become manifest, and it is demonstrated that her sovereignty is extinct in Cuba for all purposes of its rightful existence, and when a hopeful struggle for its reestablishment has degenerated into a strife which means nothing more than the useless sacrifice of human life and the utter destruction of the very subject-matter of the conflict, a situation will be presented in which our obligations to the sovereignty of Spain will be superseded by higher obligations, which we can hardly hesitate to recognize and discharge.

In my annual message to Congress, December last, speaking to this question, I said:

The near future will demonstrate whether the indispensable condition of a righteous peace, just alike to the Cubans and to Spain, as well as equitable to all our interests so intimately involved in the welfare of Cuba, is likely to be attained. If not, the exigency of further and other action by the United States will remain to be taken. When that time comes that action will be determined in the line of indisputable right and duty. It will be faced, without misgiving or hesitancy, in the light of the obligation this Government owes to itself, to the people who have confided to it the protection of their interests and honor, and to humanity.

Sure of the right, keeping free from all offense ourselves, actuated only by upright and patriotic considerations, moved neither by passion nor selfishness, the Government will continue its watchful care over the rights and property of American citizens and will abate none of its efforts to bring about by peaceful agencies a peace which shall be honorable and enduring. If it shall hereafter appear to be a duty imposed by our obligations to ourselves, to civilization, and humanity to intervene with force, it shall be without fault on our part and only because the necessity for such action will be so clear as to command the support and approval of the civilized world.

The long trial has proved that the object for which Spain has waged the war can not be attained. The fire of insurrection may flame or may smolder with varying seasons, but it has not been and it is plain that it can not be extinguished by present methods. The only hope of relief and repose from a condition which can no longer be endured is the enforced pacification of Cuba. In the name of humanity, in the name of civilization, in behalf of endangered American interests which give us the right and the duty to speak and act, the war in Cuba must stop.

In view of these facts and of these considerations, I ask the Congress to authorize and empower the President to take measures to secure a full and final termination of hostilities between the Government of Spain and the people of Cuba, and to secure in the island the establishment of a stable government, capable of maintaining order and observing its international obligations, insuring peace and tranquillity and the security of its citizens as well as our own, and to use the military and naval forces of the United States as may be necessary for these purposes.

And in the interest of humanity and to aid in preserving the lives of the starving people of the island I recommend that the distribution of food and supplies be continued, and that an appropriation be made out of the public Treasury to supplement the charity of our citizens.

The issue is now with the Congress. It is a solemn responsibility. I have exhausted every effort to relieve the intolerable condition of affairs which is at our doors. Prepared to execute every obligation imposed upon me by the Constitution and the law, I await your action.

Yesterday, and since the preparation of the foregoing message, official information was received by me that the latest decree of the Queen Regent of Spain directs General Blanco, in order to prepare and facilitate peace, to proclaim a suspension of hostilities, the duration and details of which have not yet been communicated to me.

This fact with every other pertinent consideration will, I am sure, have your just and careful attention in the solemn deliberations upon which you are about to enter. If this measure attains a successful result, then our aspirations as a Christian, peace-loving people will be realized. If it fails, it will be only another justification for our contemplated action.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 11, 1898.

The SPEAKER. The message, with accompanying papers, will be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask if the President has transmitted to the House any diplomatic correspondence between this nation and Spain at this time?

The SPEAKER. There is a supplementary message which the Chair will direct to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit herewith, in response to a resolution of the House of the 14th of February last, calling for information and correspondence in regard to the condition of the Island of Cuba, a report of the Secretary of State, with its accompanying correspondence, covering the inquiries of the resolution.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, April 11, 1898.

The SPEAKER. This message, with the accompanying documents, will be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the demand of the gentleman from Wisconsin for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROYSE. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will allow me, perhaps we can agree now, without consuming the time of the House further.

It has been agreed between us that the gentleman shall proceed with District business for thirty minutes. I make this suggestion in order to save time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana withdraws his request for consideration of the contested-election case, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] is recognized to proceed with the District business.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JAMES Z. GEORGE, late a Senator from the State of Mississippi, and extends to his family and to the people of Mississippi sincere condolence in their bereavement.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay fitting tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary transmit to the family of the deceased and to the governor of Mississippi a copy of these resolutions, with the action of the Senate thereon.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect at the conclusion of these ceremonies the Senate do adjourn.

EXTENSION OF COLUMBIA RAILWAY.

Mr. BABCOCK. I call up the bill (H. R. 9205) to authorize the extension eastwardly of the Columbia Railway.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Columbia Railway Company, incorporated under an act of Congress approved May 24, 1870, be, and it is hereby, authorized to extend its lines and to locate, construct, equip, and maintain and operate a single or double track railway, and all necessary depots, stations, sidings, switches, and turn-outs, and to run cars thereon propelled by cable, electric, compressed air, or other mechanical power to be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and to carry passengers, parcels, milk, truck, and merchandise over and along the following routes and roads in the District of Columbia, to wit: Beginning at the present eastern terminus of the railway of said company as now laid down and constructed on Benning road; thence along the north side of said road, but outside of the limits thereof, to the western edge or shore line of the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River; thence over the flats of said branch and over said branch by a wooden trestle bridge to the eastern edge or shore of said branch; thence to a point at or near the intersection of said Benning road with the road north of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad known as the Race Course road; thence along the said Race Course road, but outside its limits, to the Anacostia road; thence along said Anacostia road, but outside its limits, to Watts Creek; thence east across said Anacostia road, and, by a proper subway, underneath the tracks of the Baltimore and Potomac and Baltimore and Ohio railroads, to a point at or near the eastern corner of the District of Columbia, with a branch from the intersection of said Watts Creek and Anacostia road along Anacostia road but outside its limits, to its intersection with the eastern boundary line of the District of Columbia: Provided, That the location of said routes and the plans and specifications for the construction of the said railway lines, depots, and stations shall be subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and that the said company shall, whenever the flats of the said Eastern Branch shall be reclaimed, construct in the place and stead of the trestle bridge herein provided for a permanent structure, to be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia: And provided further, That overhead trolleys shall not be used on the lines of the said company farther west on said railroad than Fifteenth street NE. That wherever electric power propulsion is adopted upon the extension herein authorized, or on any other portion of the line of said Columbia Railway Company, no portion of the electrical circuit shall be through the earth, but a return circuit of proper capacity and located similarly to the feed-wire circuit shall be provided for the electrical current, and that whenever the trolley system is used each car shall be provided with a double trolley, and that no earth connection shall be made with any dynamo furnishing power for the road. The said company is hereby authorized to construct a roadbed or causeway on which to lay the tracks of its railway across the flats of said Eastern Branch from the western shore or edge to the channel thereof.

SEC. 2. That the main line hereby authorized to a point at or near the eastern corner of the District of Columbia shall be completed within one year from the date of the approval of this act, and the branch from said Watts Creek along said Anacostia road shall be completed within two years from the date of the approval of this act.

SEC. 3. That only one fare for a continuous ride over the route described in the company's charter, and over the extensions hereby authorized or any part thereof, shall be charged for each passenger.

SEC. 4. That the said company shall have at all times the free and uninterrupted use of the line and tracks hereby authorized, and if any person or persons shall willfully, mischievously, and unlawfully obstruct or impede the passage of cars of said railway company with a vehicle or vehicles, or otherwise, or in any manner molest or interfere with passengers or operatives while in transit, or destroy or injure the cars of said railway, or depots, stations, or other property belonging to the said railway company, the person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay for each such offense not less than twenty-five nor more than one hundred dollars, to be recovered as other fines and penalties are recovered in said District, and all persons so offending shall remain liable, in addition to said penalty, for any loss or damage occasioned by his or her or their act as aforesaid; but no suit shall be brought to enforce such fines and penalties or to recover for any such loss or damage unless commenced within sixty days after the offense shall have been committed.

SEC. 5. That the said company shall have the right to acquire and obtain the right of way over and through the land on which the aforesaid lines and routes may be located, and to acquire and hold land for necessary depots, stations, offices, store and power houses, and workshops; and in the event that said company shall not be able to come to an agreement with the owners of any land through which the said line and routes may be located, or on which it may be necessary to erect depots, stations, offices, store and power houses, or workshops, proceedings for the condemnation for the use of the company of so much land as may be required for right of way, not exceeding 80 feet in width, and for the necessary depots, stations, offices, store and power houses, and workshops may be instituted in the supreme court of the District of Columbia under and in accordance with the provisions of sections 257 to 267, both inclusive, of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, being the laws governing the condemnation of lands in said District for public highways: Provided, That it shall be the duty of the marshal of the said District, upon the request of said railway company, to summon all necessary jurors and to exercise the powers and authority conferred upon him by said laws: And provided further, That the costs and expenses of all such proceedings shall be defrayed by the said railway company. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized and empowered to locate the lines of the railway of said company within the said area, 80 feet in width, so to be acquired as aforesaid, north of the present northern line of said Benning road. In the event that said Benning road and other roads mentioned in section 1 shall be widened to a width of 90 or more feet, and further, in the event of any portions of the right of way being included in highways to be opened in future, then, and in such cases, the said company shall convey to the District of Columbia, for the use of the public, the right of way over the said area of 80 feet in width, subject, however, to the right of the said company to use and occupy the same for the operation and maintenance of its said road.

SEC. 6. That the said railway company shall have the right to issue bonds of said company to an amount necessary to cover the cost of locating, constructing, and equipping the said extended lines of railway tracks and the depots, stations, offices, store and power houses, and workshops necessary to the proper operation thereof, and to secure the same by a mortgage or deed of trust covering its corporate franchises and properties, or such portion thereof as may be necessary for that purpose: Provided, however, That the total issue of said bonds shall not in the aggregate exceed the actual cost of the construction and equipment hereinbefore authorized; and before any bond or trust deed shall be executed, the amount thereof shall be ascertained and fixed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; and for this purpose said Commissioners are hereby authorized to subpœna and examine witnesses and take such testimony as may be necessary to enable them to make such determination and fix the amount of issue: And provided further, That an appeal may be taken from the decision of said Commissioners to the supreme court of the District of Columbia. And all bonds issued in excess of the amount authorized by said Commissioners or said court, or in violation of the provisions of this act, shall be null and void.

SEC. 7. That the said railway company is authorized and empowered to contract with any railway company owning and operating, or which may hereafter own and operate, any railway connecting or intersecting the extension of the Columbia Railway herein authorized, for the joint use, management, or lease of said extended lines, or either of them, or any part thereof, upon such terms as may be agreed upon between such companies: Provided, That steam power shall not be used upon any portion of the route named herein which is or may hereafter be included within the limits of highways, nor west of the present tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio and Baltimore and Potomac railroads: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit the Congress from authorizing any other railroad company owning and operating or to own and operate any connecting or intersecting railway to use said extended lines, or either of them, or any part thereof, upon such terms as it may prescribe.

SEC. 8. That the rights conferred and the duties and obligations imposed upon said company by its charter, or by subsequent legislation, shall be held to extend and apply to the extensions herein provided for.

SEC. 9. That Congress reserves to itself the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

Section 1, line 10, insert after the comma following the word "power" the words, "except steam locomotives."

Section 4, page 4, strike out in lines 10 and 11 the following words: "not less than twenty-five nor more than," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "a sum not exceeding;" so that it will read, "the person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay for each such offense a sum not exceeding $100."

Mr. BABCOCK. The object of the first amendment, as just read, is to prevent the use of steam cars on this line.

Mr. McEWAN. I agree with the gentleman that that is a wise provision. Mr. Speaker, I should like to occupy two or three minutes upon this bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McEWAN. Mr. Speaker, I take the floor merely for the purpose of giving expression to my dissent (which I wish to put in the strongest terms) against the discrimination embraced in this bill in favor of corporations. Section 4 provides for giving to this corporation rights which are not given to the private owner of any wagon, stage, or other vehicles. I submit that, instead of this discrimination being embodied in the bill, that matter ought to be left to the common law. In order that the House may understand exactly the point which I wish to bring to its attention, let me read section 4 of the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. I wish the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McEWAN] would state what rights which are objectionable are conferred by this section upon this corporation.

Mr. McEWAN. The fourth section provides:

That the said company shall have at all times the free and uninterrupted use of the line and tracks hereby authorized, and if any person or persons shall willfully, mischievously, and unlawfully obstruct or impede the passage of cars of said railway company with a vehicle or vehicles, or otherwise, or in any manner molest or interfere with passengers or operatives while in transit, or destroy or injure the cars of said railway, or depots, stations, or other property belonging to the said railway company, the person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay for each such offense, etc.

Now, the gentleman knows as well as I do that if any person unlawfully obstructs or impedes either a car or any other vehicle or injures it in any way, the owner of the vehicle has recourse at common law. I say that a corporation should have no more right in this respect or any other matter, should receive no more care in the way of legislation, than an individual.

Mr. BENNETT. Does not the gentleman know that the ordinances of all our large cities contain just such a provision as this section?

Mr. McEWAN. I do not know that. I do not think the gentleman on reflection will assert in a broad way that such is the fact. Perhaps Brooklyn has such an ordinance.

Mr. BENNETT. Brooklyn and New York.

Mr. McEWAN. But the gentleman will not say that any such provision is general at all.

Mr. BENNETT. I believe it is general.

Mr. McEWAN. I say it is not.

Mr. KING. The gentleman from New Jersey will allow me to ask him whether at common law there is any provision that would inhibit the mischievous or criminal obstruction of a railway train?

Mr. McEWAN. Certainly there is.

Mr. KING. I should like the gentleman to refer me to the page of Blackstone where we can find such a provision.

Mr. McEWAN. It is a part of the common law, embraced in the decisions of the court. The gentleman goes on the presumption that Blackstone contains the whole body of common law. It contains only the common law as existing in the days of Blackstone. It does not contain all the common law down to the present time.

Mr. COWHERD. I should like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey on what principle of common law there could be a prosecution against the driver of a wagon, for instance, who got in front of a street car and went slowly down the street for several blocks, thus obstructing the car?

Mr. McEWAN. On the same ground that the driver of a wagon might be prosecuted if he improperly obstructed a highway.

Mr. COWHERD. But the driver of a wagon would not be violating any principle of the common law if he should simply travel slowly down the street in front of a street car.

Mr. McEWAN. If he unduly obstructed the highway, he would be liable to prosecution; otherwise the gentleman would be obliged to maintain that a vehicle of any kind can stand across a highway and prevent its proper use.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for a vote on the amendments of the committee.

The question being taken, the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. KING. On behalf of the committee, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 8 add the following:

"Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed to authorize the Columbia Railway to occupy the right of way of any other company."

Mr. BABCOCK. That is a committee amendment. I hope it will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH, WASHINGTON DIOCESE.

Mr. BABCOCK. I call up the bill (H. R. 8972) to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Diocese of Washington."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act approved March 16, 1896, entitled "An act to incorporate the Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Diocese of Washington," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the said corporation shall have full power and authority to take and hold subscriptions, contributions, donations, grants, devises, or bequests, in money, real estate, or otherwise, which heretofore have been made or which may hereafter be made for the purpose of an Episcopal residence, diocesan house, church colleges, church or parish schools, churches or mission chapels, and for the purpose of creating a permanent fund or endowment for the support of the episcopate in said diocese, and to or in behalf of religious, missionary, charitable, or educational agencies' uses or purposes now existing or hereafter to exist under the jurisdiction, control, or sanction of said convention within the limits of said diocese, the annual income from which shall not exceed $100,000, and the same to invest and the proceeds thereof to apply for the purposes aforesaid as may from time to time be deemed most expedient, and to appoint, in its discretion, an executive committee or other trustees, boards, or agencies, by whatsoever name or names they may be designated, to administer such funds or property in such manner and form and with such authority as the said corporation shall from time to time prescribe: Provided, however, and always, That in such administration the respective funds shall be kept distinct and separate; that each fund shall be held liable only for obligations that may have been incurred in its own proper behoof; and that the principal sum or amount of such subscriptions, contributions, donations, grants, devises, and bequests for permanent endowment of the episcopate shall be at all times invested in some safe and profitable stocks, mortgages, deeds of trust, or other securities, and the expenses of administering the same, the salary of the bishop, and other charges shall be payable and paid only out of the annual interest, dividends, or profits thereof: And provided further, That unless this amendment shall be accepted by resolution of the convention of the said diocese at its next annual meeting, and a copy of such resolution of acceptance, certified by the secretary of the convention, be filed for record with the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia within sixty days thereafter, the same shall become void and of no effect."

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD].

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Speaker, I apprehend that this bill needs no explanation. Its object is merely to amend the law so as to remove a doubt as to whether the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Diocese of Washington can take and hold real estate.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BABCOCK. The Committee on the District of Columbia has no further business to present.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—FAIRCHILD VS. WARD, SIXTEENTH DISTRICT, NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the election case.

The Clerk read the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Bon L. Fairchild was not elected to the Fifty-fifth Congress from the Sixteenth Congressional district of New York, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That William L. Ward was elected to the Fifty-fifth Congress from the Sixteenth Congressional district of New York, and is entitled to a seat therein.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I have a minority report which I desire to have considered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROYSE].

Mr. ROYSE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to arrange about the time that shall be consumed in the discussion of this case. What length of time will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] want on his side?

Mr. GAINES. I thought we had agreed in committee upon three hours and a half on a side. There are quite a number of gentlemen on this side who want to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROYSE] is recognized.

Mr. ROYSE. Mr. Speaker, it is agreed that we shall not extend the time beyond three hours and a half on a side.

The SPEAKER. Three hours and a half on a side?

Mr. ROYSE. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether it is necessary to spend seven hours in a debate upon this question?

Mr. ROYSE. I am content to limit it to two hours on a side, if the other side are.

Mr. GAINES. I understood that when this matter was disposed of the committee had agreed upon three hours and a half on a side.

Mr. ROYSE. It has not been submitted to the House, and I am willing to confine it to two hours on a side.

Mr. GAINES. I have divided out the time. I hope the gentleman will not seek to shorten the time when I have divided it out with the understanding that there was to be three hours and a half on a side. This is a very important question of law. It is something more than simply seating or unseating the contestant or contestee.

Mr. ROYSE. I ask unanimous consent that a vote be taken at 5 o'clock, then.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that a vote be taken at 5 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I must make objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects?

Mr. GAINES. Yes.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman from Indiana can give notice that he will move the previous question at 5 o'clock.

Mr. ROYSE. I give notice that I will move the previous question at a quarter before 5.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GAINES. I want to make the announcement that it was our distinct agreement, made in the committee after due deliberation, that there should be three hours and a half on a side. This gives less time than that and takes everybody by surprise. Gentlemen to whom I have laboriously farmed out this time have come here prepared to discuss this question. It is an important legal question, and I do hope the gentleman from Indiana will deal fairly in this matter, having agreed to it in the committee. After the committee have recommended it and we have agreed upon it, then to come in and abrogate that agreement seems to me unfair.

Mr. ROYSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask to proceed with the debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized and will proceed.

Mr. ROYSE. Mr. Speaker, I am aware that for several days past——

Mr. GAINES. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to yield to me in order that I may submit a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SHERMAN). The gentleman from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. GAINES. I hope he will yield to me to allow me to make a request.

Mr. ROYSE. I yield to the gentleman a minute for that purpose.

Mr. GAINES. The contestant, Mr. Fairchild, desires to be heard in his own behalf, and I ask unanimous consent that he may be heard at the proper time.

Mr. ROYSE. Shall I proceed, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will not the Chair submit the request for unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Indiana yields for that purpose, of course the Chair will do so.

Mr. GAINES. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will yield long enough to have that question submitted, because it is important that if the contestant is to speak he shall know it.

Mr. ROYSE. I will yield to the gentleman time enough to allow him to make that request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] asks unanimous consent that the contestant, Mr. Fairchild, may be permitted to speak in his own behalf. Is there objection?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Out of the time of the other side—his own side.

Mr. GAINES. Of course.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Out of the time of the minority.

Mr. GAINES. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked that the contestant may be permitted to speak in his own behalf, out of the time of the minority. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROYSE. Mr. Speaker, I am aware that the attention of the members of this House has for many days past been engrossed with very important public problems. I realize, too, that it is very difficult to fix the attention upon the question that is now before the House, for, in spite of all we can do, our minds will be drawn away from the subject of discussion to those problems of more serious import to us all. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, the question as to who shall occupy a seat upon this floor is an exceedingly important one, not only to the contestants themselves, but to the people of the district that they ask to represent; and not only to them, but also to this House as well. It is important, therefore, that we should give every question of this kind a careful and deliberate consideration, and I will ask each individual member in this presence to give as close attention as possible to the discussion of this important question.

The questions involved in this contest need not arouse the political prejudice or bias of anyone. Unfortunately, sometimes the settlement of questions of this kind is upon party lines, or at least a suspicion of that kind is created. But to-day, in the determination of this contest, there is no call for an appeal to partisan bias or to partisan prejudice.

The contest is waged between two Republicans, and it grows out of the controversy between them as to who was the regular nominee of the Republican party of this Congressional district. The controversy goes back to the holding of the primaries which elected delegates to the Congressional convention. It entered into these primaries, and the struggle was made by each one of the parties to secure the delegation from each one of the primaries. This resulted, in some instances, in two sets of delegates being selected to attend the Congressional convention, one set of delegates supporting Mr. Ward and another set of delegates being friendly to Mr. Fairchild. To complicate the matter still further, there were two Congressional committees claiming the right to call for a meeting of the Congressional convention. It will be necessary to give a brief statement of the facts as to how these two committees came into existence.

At the convention in 1894, held by the Republicans of the district, in addition to nominating a candidate to Congress that convention also selected a committee whose duty it was to call the next Congressional convention. This convention was held in 1894, at which Mr. Fairchild was nominated to Congress and afterwards elected. This committee appointed in 1894 called a Congressional convention in the spring of 1896 to select delegates to the national Republican convention. At this convention, in addition to the selection of delegates to the national convention, there was also appointed a committee to call the next Congressional convention. The next Congressional convention, of course, was the convention that was to nominate a candidate for Congress.

There seems to have been no doubt in this convention but what it had full authority to appoint such committee. No controversy was raised in regard to the subject. Every person seems to concede that the appointment of a committee was absolutely regular. Indeed, one of the members of the old committee, Mr. Teneyck, who afterwards insisted this convention had no authority to appoint a committee, moved in this convention that a new member be added to this new committee, and his motion was carried and the committee was increased by one additional member. Things ran along until the primaries were held, and when it resulted in two sets of delegates being returned for a number of these primaries, the controversy arose as to the regularity of appointing a committee at this spring convention of 1896.

It seems that a majority of the old committee appointed in 1894 were favorable to the nomination of Mr. Fairchild, while the new committee selected in 1896 at the spring convention was favorable to Mr. Ward. So the question arose as to which one of these committees should call the Republican Congressional convention, the old committee, appointed in 1894, insisting that the appointing of a committee in 1896 was irregular, and they were the ones that had the power to call the Congressional convention, and the committee of 1896 insisting that they superseded the old committee, and that the authority of calling the Congressional convention belonged to them; and hence this dispute arose.

This resulted in the calling of two Congressional conventions—one called by the old committee appointed in 1894, which nominated Mr. Fairchild, and the other called by the committee appointed in the spring of 1896, which nominated Mr. Ward. These conventions were held. The one called by the new committee unanimously nominated Mr. Ward, his credentials were made out in regular form and were filed with the secretary of state, the officer with whom they were to be deposited according to the laws of the State of New York. The one called by the old committee unanimously nominated Mr. Fairchild, and his credentials were made out in regular form and filed with the secretary of state in obedience to the laws of the State of New York. Then the question arose as to which one of these nominees should go upon the official ballot in the Republican column.

The law provides that in controversies of this kind the officer with whom the certificates of nomination are filed shall first decide the question. Consequently, we find these parties appearing before the secretary of state, submitting their proofs and arguments, and asking for his decision. After deliberation, the secretary of state decided in favor of Mr. Fairchild, that he was the regular nominee of the Republican party of that district, and his name should go on the official ballot as such. The law provides that the determination of the secretary of state shall not be final, but authorizes that decision to be reviewed by the supreme court or a justice thereof or by the county judge. Consequently, Mr. Ward brought proceedings before Judge Edwards, a justice of the supreme court, to review this decision of the secretary of state.

Notice was issued to the secretary of state to bring up the papers for review, and this was accordingly done. On the day set for the hearing Mr. Fairchild appeared. It seems that in the first instance he was not a party to these proceedings to review. The law is somewhat ambiguous in its terms. It designates that a notice shall be served upon the secretary of state, but that is all the notice that the law requires. So that it seems upon first view that Mr. Ward and the secretary of state were the only proper parties to the proceedings.

Mr. Fairchild, however, appeared before Justice Edwards and asked that he be permitted to intervene as a party. This motion was resisted by Mr. Ward's attorneys, but after deliberation upon the question Justice Edwards decided that Mr. Fairchild was a proper party, if not a necessary party; and therefore upon his own motion he was admitted as a party to the proceedings to review.

Mr. HARTMAN. Is it not a fact that at the time Mr. Fairchild made application to be made a party to this hearing he also raised the question of the jurisdiction of the court to determine the matter?

Mr. ROYSE. I will come to that question after a while.

Mr. HARTMAN. That is a fact, though, is it not?

Mr. ROYSE. Later on it was. It was not a part of the original motion.

Justice Edwards heard the evidence and the arguments of counsel, and took the case under deliberation for two or three days. He then announced his decision in favor of Mr. Ward, that he was the regular nominee of the Republican party, and that his name should go upon the ballot as the candidate. An appeal was taken from that decision to the appellate division of the supreme court for that judicial department. The case was heard before the appellate division, and at its conclusion the supreme court affirmed the decision of Justice Edwards, and also decided that Mr. Ward was the regular nominee of the Republican party.

That ended the case until after the election. In obedience to this decision of the supreme court of that judicial department, Mr. Ward's name was inserted upon the official ballot in the Republican column. That ballot was furnished at each polling place throughout the Congressional district. The decision of Justice Edwards and that of the supreme court were known throughout the entire Congressional district. So far as the evidence goes, it seems that every single voter in that Congressional district knew that Justice Edwards and the supreme court had decided in favor of Mr. Ward.

Mr. HARTMAN. There was no affirmative evidence to that effect, was there?

Mr. ROYSE. Yes; there was affirmative evidence.

Mr. HARTMAN. To what extent was it affirmative?

Mr. ROYSE. To quite an extent.

Mr. HARTMAN. To what extent?

Mr. ROYSE. I can not answer with absolute precision, but to quite an extent.

Mr. HARTMAN. How many witnesses testified?

Mr. ROYSE. I can not give you the exact number.

Mr. HARTMAN. Suppose there were 200 witnesses so testifying; could their testimony bind the 30,000 other voters who did not so testify?

Mr. ROYSE. I will meet that question after a while.

It would be incumbent upon the contestant to show at least that they (the voters) did not know it; and I may as well state right here a fact which I did not intend to refer to until later on.

It is a small Congressional district, so far as territory goes. It is confined within the limits of Westchester County and two assembly districts of the city of New York, and I am informed that formerly these two assembly districts belonged to Westchester County. So practically we have a Congressional district confined within the limits of a single county, thickly populated, the means of information ample, and there can be no question that every voter in that Congressional district knew of the action of Justice Edwards and of the supreme court of the State of New York. That ballot was voted at the election.

I will add another thing in order that it may be correctly understood. The law of the State of New York provides that a man, though not nominated by any political body, may yet have his name placed upon the official ballot upon a petition signed by a certain number of legal voters of the district. Mr. Fairchild procured such a petition; so that his name went upon this ballot, and the ballot as voted had Mr. Ward's name upon it as the Republican nominee and Mr. Fairchild's name as an independent candidate. That is the only ballot that was voted at this Congressional election. There were 30,759 votes cast for Mr. Ward. There were 770 votes cast for Mr. Fairchild on the face of the returns which are not disputed or controverted. Mr. Ward had over 3,000 majority over all the candidates voted for at that election. He received a certificate of election, and by virtue of that he now holds a seat in this body.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ROYSE. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Though the gentleman has not yet discussed the proposition, I understand it is a fact, as I observe from this report, that the name of the contestant was by request of his friends, on petition regularly filed in the office of secretary of state, also printed on this ticket.

Mr. ROYSE. Yes; I so stated.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not also a fact that everybody who desired to vote for him had that opportunity?

Mr. ROYSE. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Further than that, is it not a fact that under the law of New York, if anyone desired so to do, he could have scratched out the name of Mr. Ward upon the ticket and written in the name of Mr. Fairchild under the regular Republican device?

Mr. ROYSE. That is true; but I will discuss that matter later on.

After the election was over and Mr. Ward was declared elected to Congress, Mr. Fairchild appealed his case to the court of appeals of the State of New York. In January following the election the court of appeals decided that Mr. Fairchild was the regular nominee and that Justice Edwards had no jurisdiction to hear the review. I will discuss that decision further on. I refer to it now for the purpose of bringing to the minds of members of the House the exact question in controversy.

Mr. Fairchild now insists that the decision of that court fixed it beyond quibble or dispute—conclusively establishes it, in other words—that he was the regular nominee of the Republican party and, as a result of that nomination, insists that these 30,709 votes cast for Mr. Ward should be counted for him and that he should be declared elected. That is the contention of the contestant in this case.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether it will be seriously contended here or not that this ballot, under the decision of that court, was a void ballot. I know the ballots were attacked, and it so appears in the argument before the committee. It seems, however, in the minority report of the committee that the ballot is conceded as a legal and valid ballot, but what they contend for is that the votes cast for Ward shall be counted for Mr. Fairchild.

They do not contend that they were given for Fairchild by the voter, but, because the decision of the court of appeals in the State of New York declared that he was the regular nominee of the party, that he should be entitled to the ballot. In other words, they say that the voter was a kind of machine; that he voted mechanically; that he was bound to support the regular nominee of the party, whoever he might be, and when he voted the Republican ticket, that he voted as a sort of machine, and consequently voted for the nominees of that party as a whole, and not for any man on the ticket. It is contended that all you need is the caption of the ticket; that the names need not be there; that they are mere surplusage, and that if you go in and vote the caption on the ticket, then you are to hunt up who the nominees are. That is the contention, and I propose, Mr. Speaker, to discuss that position of the minority at some length.

But before proceeding to that point I wish to call the attention of the House to some features of the law of the State of New York with reference to elections. The law of the State of New York is similar to the law now in force in the majority of the States of the Union. It is fashioned after the Australian ballot system, but in some details is dissimilar to the law in force in a majority of the States. It recognizes the nominees made by party organizations. That is, that they shall be printed in the ticket, on the official ballot, under a specific emblem, and that a straight ticket can be voted by stamping at the head of the ticket, and thus voting for all of the names printed on the ticket.

There is another peculiarity about the law to which I wish to call your attention for a moment. It provides that although a man is not nominated, still if the voter wants to, he can vote for that man. For example, when the voter goes into the polling booths with his ballot, he discovers there a Republican ticket, a Democratic ticket, a Prohibition ticket, and a People's Party ticket; but if he does not discover a name on these ballots of some man not nominated by any party for whom he desires to vote, he can strike out one of the names and write that name in, and thus vote for his choice, as he sees fit.

Moreover, the ballot is not as sacred in New York as in some of the other States of the Union. For example, if the clerk fails to furnish the ballots at the polling places, or they are lost or destroyed, the clerk can substitute other ballots in their place; and if he fails to do so, the voters at each precinct can make up their own ballots. So the law of New York provides in express terms that it is not in the power of any official who is charged with the framing of the ballots to disfranchise a voter; but he can vote anyway, whether the official ballot is provided or not.

Now it does not make a ballot invalid if the clerk puts a name on which was not nominated by a political party. In other words, it is beyond his power to disfranchise the elector at any voting precinct. This has been expressly decided by the highest court in the State of New York, and this case arose in the election of 1895. There was a faction in the Democratic party in Oswego County that had been in the habit for years of nominating their own local candidates for various county officers. They were entitled to nominate candidates under the Australian ballot law for such officers because they had cast 1 per cent of the votes of that district.

But they were not entitled to nominate candidates for State offices. It appears, however, that at the fall election of 1895 they nominated candidates for local offices, but nominated none for State offices. When the ballot was made up, the clerk put into their ticket the candidates nominated by the Democratic party for State offices. They had not been nominated by the proper parties, but the clerk printed their names in the ticket. A case was brought before the court, action being instituted to compel the clerk to strike from the ticket the names so added. This was refused by the lower court, but after the election the case found its way into the court of appeals, which took up the question and decided it, saying that the clerk had no authority to print the Democratic candidates for State offices in that ballot.

It was wholly unwarrantable and unauthorized under the decision of the court. Then, of course, after that was done, a mandamus was brought to compel the returning board not to count those votes of the Democratic State officials; and that case went also to the court of appeals, and they decided that the votes should be counted. They said it was unlawful and unauthorized to print them on the ballots, but that the clerk having done so, and the innocent voter having voted such tickets having the right to vote, and the election having been held, these votes should be counted, and therefore that the votes should stand.

I think from what I have said now that this fact is established, that this was a valid ballot, no matter whether the name of the regular nominee was upon it or not. It was still a valid ballot and could be voted by the voters of that district.

There is another thing now to understand. The law of the State of New York makes every voter a free man. It can not compel him to vote any ticket that is prepared by any official. No matter how it is prepared, no matter in what way it is made up, when the voter goes into the booth to cast his ballot he stands there as free as he ever was in all the days of his life. He may be a Republican. He can vote the Republican ticket if he wants to. If he does not want to do it, he can vote for some of the men on it if he desires to, or he can utterly refuse to vote it. He can strike out all the names on that ballot and vote for any man that he chooses.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROYSE]. The Chair, having consulted with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], understands from him that the gentleman from Tennessee supposed an agreement had been reached as to the division of time and the time of taking the vote. That is not the case, and the Chair suggests now that the request be put as coming from the gentleman from Indiana or the gentleman from from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], that debate be closed at 4.45, and that the time, from the time the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROYSE] began to speak until then, be equally divided, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROYSE] and the other half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES. I now make that request.

Mr. ROYSE. That is agreeable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to that request? The Chair hears none, and that is the order.

Mr. ROYSE. I desire now to call attention to this decision to which I have referred, wherein the court of appeals of the State of New York held that that was a valid ballot and that the vote should be counted. I desire to call attention to it because of the fact that it lays down the principle as to the freedom of each elector. It is found on page 142 of 148 New York Reports:

The question is presented as to the effect of such unauthorized action by the county clerk upon the votes cast for justices of the supreme court by the use of the tickets of the "Regular Democratic party." No suggestion is made that the persons who voted the ballots were not duly qualified electors. The ballots used were official ballots, provided by the county clerk, whose duty it was under the law to prepare, print, and distribute them to subordinate officials, whose duty in turn was to place them in the hands of the inspectors of election of each election district in the county for use at the election. The printed indorsements, including the authentication by the county clerk required by the election law, appear in due form on the outside of the ballots.

The ballots were regular in form in every respect. There was nothing within or upon the ballot from which a voter could know that the ballot was not made up in exact conformity to the law. It was impossible for him to ascertain from an inspection that the candidates for State and judicial offices printed in the column of the "Regular Democratic party" had not been regularly nominated by that party, or that the clerk, in arranging and printing the ballot, had not inserted the names with full authority. The effort in this proceeding is to disfranchise innocent voters because of a latent defect in the official ballot furnished by the State, not discernible on inspection, which ballot they were compelled to use, the defect consisting in the unauthorized insertion therein by a public official, charged with the duty of making up and printing the ballots, of names of candidates in a party column not duly nominated by such party.

The intention of the voters who used this party column to express their choice is clear and admits of no doubt. Each one received his ballot from the inspectors, marked it with the cross under the party name and emblem, and returned it to the inspectors, by whom it was deposited in the box and subsequently counted. We can conceive of no principle—

I ask your attention to this—

We can conceive of no principle which permits the disfranchisement of innocent voters for the mistake or even the willful misconduct of election officers in performing the duty cast upon them. The object of elections is to ascertain the popular will and not to thwart it. The object of election laws is to secure the rights of duly qualified electors, and not to defeat them.

That is the doctrine laid down in the State of New York, and it is wholesome.

Now, I want to read a little from the other case to which I referred. It begins on page 139 of the same volume, where the court of appeals has said that the printing of the names of the Democratic State officials was unauthorized. So they lay down the rule as to the voters:

The most radical change in the ballot system made by recent legislation consists in the substitution of an official ballot for the ballots formerly printed and furnished by political parties or individuals. By the new system the State undertakes to print and furnish ballots for the use of electors, uniform in appearance, containing the names of candidates of political parties or nominating bodies for the offices to be filled at elections.

Now, I want to call your attention to the few sentences that follow:

The legislature in framing the system was bound to recognise the freedom of choice which is of the essence of popular elections. It could not itself designate the candidates to be voted for or limit the right of any elector to vote for any person he might choose.

Such is the law of the State of New York. Every man who goes into the booth to vote is an absolutely free man, not bound by the ticket that is prepared, not bound by anything. He is alone with his own conscience and he votes according to the dictates of his highest and best judgment.

Then what shall we say under a law of that kind? When the voters of this district went in and voted that ticket, casting 30,709 votes for Mr. Ward, that represents the independent, untrammeled, conscientious judgment of every voter who voted that ticket.

And now you are asked to disfranchise these voters, and why? Why, they say, upon the ground that perhaps there was a mistake in the decision that Ward was the regular nominee. And it is said in argument that if Fairchild's name had been on the ticket he would have been elected.

That may be true, and it may not be true. But the weakness of the argument is in the use of that little word "if." Perhaps there could be a thousand men picked out in his district, who, if their names had been upon the Republican ticket, might have been elected, but the misfortune is, their names were not there. They are like the dog that undertook to catch the rabbit. If he had not stopped he would have caught the rabbit. But the misfortune was that the dog did stop, and consequently did not catch the rabbit. So with Fairchild; his misfortune was that his name was not on that ticket.

Mr. Ward's name was, and every voter knew it was there, and it expressed the honest, conscientious judgment of these voters. Why, a statement of their argument is so absurd on its face that a man will not entertain it for a moment. Think of it! A man votes for the nominee whether he is on the ballot or not, they say. That is contrary to the very laws of New York. The law of New York requires that every nominee's name shall be certified; it shall not be certified that the party has made a nomination, but the name of the man shall be certified. Then it directs the official who makes up the ballot to put that name on the ballot, not simply print a ballot with the Republican emblem at the head of it, but print the name of that candidate on the ballot.

The law requires that tally sheets shall be furnished upon which shall be written the name of every man voted for, and opposite his name shall be tabulated all the votes that were cast for that name. These names and these votes are certified to the returning board. The returning board calculates and figures up the number of votes not given to the party, but given to the man. They send that to the secretary of state. The secretary of state does not care what party he belongs to; it makes no difference to him.

What he wants is the name of the man, the votes that were cast for him, and then he gives the certificate of that man's election. Consequently it is not sufficient, it can not be sufficient, to simply cast a blank ballot with a cross at the head of it, with a Republican emblem; that is a vote for nobody. That emblem on the ballot is for the purpose of designating where you will find the Republican column, and for no other purpose. The real substance of the ballot is the name printed on it.

Another word right here. A ballot must be complete upon its face. In other words, the inspectors of election must be able to tell upon the face of that ballot for whom the vote was cast. The inspectors can not refer to any extraneous matter in order to determine for whom the vote was cast. Now, pick up the ballot voted at that election; look at it on its face. What will the inspector of election say? Shall they go outside and say perhaps some other man was elected whose name ought to be there?

They have no right to go to any other place than to that ballot. That is the only way a man can vote. He can vote for no man conditionally. He can not vote a ballot which imports, "I vote for Mr. Ward if he shall turn out to be the nominee; otherwise I vote for Mr. Fairchild if he gets the decision." You can not vote that way. You must vote for one or the other of these men. That is the way every one of these votes was cast. They express the honest, conscientious desire of every single voter in that Congressional district, and it will be an arbitrary act if you take a single one of those votes and count them for Mr. Fairchild. Nowhere under the sun can you do it without violating the law, without doing injustice to the voter and breaking down the whole ballot system of the State of New York.

Of course, it is said that Mr. Fairchild is the regular nominee, and it is said by the decision of the court of appeals that that question is settled beyond cavil or controversy. The committee was not very much in harmony with that decision. Evidently the court did not deliberate over that question with the care it ought to have exercised. The grounds upon which it held that Mr. Fairchild was the regular nominee are these: That the State committee and the State convention and the judicial committee and the judicial convention decided in favor of the Fairchild delegates to these respective conventions, and that therefore the court ought to be bound by the decision of the party committees.

They refused to go behind that decision and examine into the real merits of the case. Now, I doubt whether it is judicious or proper for a court to absolutely abrogate its functions. It is there for some purpose. If it is going to abrogate its functions and simply register the decision of the State judicial committee, then its act is not judicial but simply ministerial; but when you go behind that, when you go behind that decision of these party committees and party authorities, you will find that Mr. Fairchild was not the regular nominee of the convention.

Mr. COLSON. Did not the highest court of appeals of the State of New York decide, upon a full hearing, that Mr. Fairchild was the nominee of the Republican party and entitled to have his name printed on the Republican ballot?

Mr. ROYSE. That is what I have said. That was after the election. They made that decision. They did not go into the merits of the case; they simply took the decision of the party committee and said they were bound absolutely by that, forgetting their judicial functions. But when you go behind that——

Mr. COLSON. Does the gentleman mean to say that the decision of the court of appeals of the State of New York is not to be regarded?

Mr. ROYSE. Oh, no; but I do not regard this decision as conclusive on this question at all, because I think they should have gone into the merits of the question.

Mr. SHANNON. Did they not go into the merits?

Mr. ROYSE. No; they did not.

Mr. SHANNON. Then it will be necessary to read that decision in order to show that they did. It is a very full decision; it touches every point.

Mr. ROYSE. No; it does not.

Mr. SHANNON. The gentleman will excuse me; I think it does.

Mr. ROYSE. No; they simply refused to consider anything else than the decision of the State committee and the judicial convention, and left the matter right there.

But if you go behind that and look into the evidence, as Justice Edwards did and as the supreme court of New York did, you will find that Mr. Ward was the regular nominee. Of course there was a spirited controversy. It was waged with a great deal of earnestness. The Congressional district is composed of three assembly districts of Westchester County and two of the city of New York. These elected delegates to the Congressional convention, which was composed of 24 delegates. It is conceded at the outset that Mr. Fairchild had 5 to begin with from the First Westchester assembly district.

At Tarrytown there was a conflict as to the delegates. I will come to that presently. Mr. Ward had the Sixth and the Third assembly districts of Westchester County. All the remaining districts were controverted. In the Tarrytown convention there was a great deal of discussion; but Mr. Ward is entitled to the delegates from that convention, numbering 5, because he had a majority of the regularly appointed delegates to that convention. In that convention there were 71 delegates—38 of them uncontested. Of those 38 uncontested delegates Mr. Ward had 24 and Fairchild 14. So, if the question were to be decided on the uncontested delegates, Mr. Ward has a majority. As to two of these precincts the contests were trumped up—mere paper contests; and if you give Mr. Ward those, then he had 41 delegates in that convention.

In the next contested assembly district—the Thirty-fifth assembly district of New York—they held their precinct convention. Mr. Ward and Mr. Fairchild both went into that convention. Candidates were put up for presiding officers and were voted for. Mr. Ward's man was elected by over 21 votes. They then put up two sets of candidates for delegates. When the vote was taken Mr. Ward's delegates were elected by over 30 majority. After that was done Mr. Fairchild withdrew and held another convention, which appointed another set of delegates. The State committee, having some political purpose in view, went to work and decided in favor of these delegates, and that is the way this decision came about. When you go to the merits of the matter, there is no question, there can be no question, about the regularity of Mr. Ward's nomination.

But your committee has concluded with respect to this matter that it did not make any difference who was the regular nominee. The voter was there as a free man, entitled to vote his honest sentiments; he did vote them; his ballot represented his conscientious judgment as to which of these men should be a Representative in Congress. That being true, you can not throw the election aside because the ballot may have been in some respects informal; and you can not count the votes cast for Mr. Ward as if they had been cast for Mr. Fairchild, for not a single voter outside of the 770 who voted for Mr. Fairchild on his independent ticket has said that he voted for him.

Mr. COLSON. The gentleman has just stated that Mr. Fairchild withdrew from the convention. Does that appear in the evidence taken in this case?

Mr. ROYSE. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLSON. What witness so testifies?

Mr. ROYSE. There were several affidavits filed which appear in the record that went to the court and upon which the case was heard before Judge Edwards.

Mr. COLSON. Do those affidavits appear in the record here?

Mr. ROYSE. Not in the printed record as we have it here. Part of the record has not been printed here.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Five minutes.

Mr. ROYSE. Mr. Speaker, it will be impossible for me in the little time remaining to enter upon the discussion of any other feature of this case. I want gentlemen to understand distinctly just where this case rests. The whole case rests upon the action of the voter. No matter what any court has decided, the voter as he went to the polls on the day of the election was just as free as you or I were when we went to the polls—absolutely as free. He went into the voting booth just as free as any voter ever was in all his life. The mark which he put upon his ballot was his own free choice. If he desired to cast his ballot for Mr. Ward, he put his mark on the ballot with the knowledge that it would be counted for Mr. Ward, whatever the courts might have said or might have done. Here was the supreme court higher than any other court——

Mr. SHANNON. Except the court of appeals.

Mr. ROYSE. Above the court of appeals. Higher than the court of appeals is the court of the people. Every man who went to the polls took up this question, heard the evidence on both sides, and decided it. He was appealed to on both sides. He knew that Fairchild's name was on the ticket as an independent candidate.

Mr. SHANNON. Why?

Mr. ROYSE. Because the name was printed there, and he had eyes.

Mr. SHANNON. The law required it to be printed there.

Mr. ROYSE. He knew it was, because he had eyes to see it. It is a matter which was distinctly known to him; and the same voter saw on the ballot in the Republican column the name of Mr. Ward. He was not bound to vote for him or for that ballot. He could vote for him or not, just as he pleased. He had a perfect right to do so under the law of the State. His ballot would have been perfectly good if he had scratched out the name and inserted another. He weighed the argument on all sides, understanding his rights and his duties under the law, and decided to cast his vote for Mr. Ward.

And that, Mr. Speaker, is just as honest a vote, as honest an action on the part of the voter, as any action performed by any voter in the election of 1896, and Mr. Ward holds the seat here to-day as untarnished as any other member on this floor. He comes here with a verdict of the people behind him, the honest indorsement of the uncorrupted voters of the district, the choice of the electors of the Sixteenth Congressional district of the great State of New York. That right, Mr. Chairman, and the right of a man—the right of the voter to select the candidate for whom he shall vote—is a right that is too sacred to be cast aside by this body on a mere technicality.

But above all, Mr. Speaker, higher than all, and before all, is the freedom of election and the choice of the electors. The elections in that State are just as free now as they were under the old system. But to adopt the rule laid down on the other side of the House that a man has not the right to select his own candidate, you enslave him; to adopt a rule that would bind him hand and foot, you make him no longer a free man, and his ballot would not be the ballot of an untrammeled voter.

I ask a decision favorable to the honest elections in that State. A decision favorable to the freedom of men who go to the polls to vote their sentiments, such sentiment as they may honestly entertain, which shall not be destroyed or defeated or forbidden or refused by a mere technicality.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BENNETT in the chair). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN].

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to occupy the time of the House for a very few moments only in the discussion of this case. It is one, as has been said by the chairman of the committee [Mr. ROYSE], arising out of a contest between Mr. Fairchild and Mr. Ward, from the Sixteenth Congressional district of the State of New York, and both of the parties to this contest being members of the Republican party, the question of the political bias or prejudice of any member here may be entirely eliminated from the consideration of the matter.

To my mind the great and controlling question involved in this controversy is the question disclosed by the report of the committee. It is whether a citizen of the United States, in any Congressional district in the United States, may be permitted by questionable methods, by methods if not fraudulent, at least of a sharp character, to have his own name substituted upon the ballot in lieu of the name of the party entitled to have his name printed thereon. That is all there is in the case.

The chairman of the committee has clearly stated the facts in so far as the rights of the respective parties to have their names so printed are concerned. The convention which was called by the committee which subsequently nominated Mr. Fairchild was the regular convention called under and by authority of the precedents of previous conventions in the history of the Sixteenth Congressional district of New York.

That convention was called in pursuance to the call of the regular committee, appointed by the regular convention of 1894, and the convention called to nominate Mr. Ward was called not by a regular committee, not pursuant to any authority granted them by any previous convention, or any authority which had a warrant for such action, but was called by a convention, Mr. Speaker, as you well know as a member of Congress from New York [referring to Mr. BENNETT]—the convention which was only authorized by the national convention to send delegates to represent that district in that convention. Having done so, and complete authority was given them for that purpose, their functions became exhausted. They had no power to do any other act except to adjourn. But instead of that, this convention assumed the right of appointing the committee and candidates, a right which did not belong to them, and, having no right, the appointment of such a committee fell because of lack of authority.

Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the House, and I ask gentlemen to read the report, to the facts as to the testimony on this point, which is not very long. I ask you to read the facts concerning the methods employed to obtain the printing of Mr. Ward's name on the ballot. It will be remembered, as stated by the chairman of the committee, that primarily the secretary of state determines, as he has a right to do under the law, whose name is entitled to go on the ballot. That right he determined in favor of Ben L. Fairchild.

It is true that at that time the attorneys of Mr. Ward appeared before Justice Edwards, a judge not having jurisdiction of the case at all. There they made their application to have his name placed upon that ballot. Upon that application an order was granted, and I call the attention of gentlemen upon this floor to practices which were then perpetrated and performed by the attorneys of Mr. Ward which ought to have disbarred them from practicing before any reputable and competent court of the United States. They appeared there and obtained that order, and having obtained it, instead of following the statutes, instead of having that order entered of record, so that the party opposed to it could have the benefit of an appeal, they took that order and put it in their pockets and sneaked out of the court room, as disreputable attorneys would do, and denied the right of the contestant in this case to appeal from the decision of that court until after the election had been held and no substantial right could be secured by him by virtue of that appeal.

Mr. Speaker, that one statement itself ought to damn beyond redemption the right of this contestee here to any consideration at the hands of this House.

Mr. OLMSTED. I should like to ask the gentleman if he is aware that the decree of Judge Edwards was prepared in the presence of Mr. Ward's counsel and Mr. Fairchild's counsel, and was finally agreed upon on Saturday afternoon, October 17, and was filed in the office of the clerk of the court on Monday morning at 10 o'clock, the clerk's office being closed on Saturday afternoon?

Mr. GAINES. I do not agree to that statement. That is not a correct statement of the facts.

Mr. HARTMAN. On the contrary, it was prepared on Friday.

Mr. GAINES. It was prepared Friday night, October 16.

Mr. HARTMAN. That very order was signed on Friday evening between 5 and 6 o'clock, and it was not filed until the following Monday morning.

Mr. GAINES. They stuck it in their pockets and went off with it.

Mr. HARTMAN. Yes; those are the facts.

Mr. BELFORD. Do you mean to say that the order that was filed with the secretary of state was signed on Friday evening?

Mr. HARTMAN. Whether the order——

Mr. BELFORD. Answer that question. Do you mean to say that?

Mr. HARTMAN. I will answer that question, and I will say to the gentleman that I will answer it in my own language. I am not in the habit of having words crammed down my throat by him or anybody else. I will answer the gentleman, and I will say to him frankly that the original order that was signed was the one that was contended for and contended against by the respective counsel on Friday, and that it was signed between 5 and 6 o'clock on Friday, and that subsequently, I presume, it was modified—I do not know, but presume it was—because this case is full of "ways that are dark and tricks that are vain" on the part of the gentlemen who represented the contestee in this case. I will say that on Monday it was filed, and I will say that it ought to have been filed on Saturday morning, and if it had been filed on Saturday morning the case would have been appealed to the court of appeals in time to make effective the decision and to enable the gentleman who contests in this case to have a decision rendered in his favor in time to do him some good.

Mr. SHANNON. And there would be no contest in this House now.

Mr. HARTMAN. And there would have been no contest in this House to-day.

Mr. GAINES. I read from the contestee's brief:

> On October 16 Hon. Samuel Edwards, a justice of the supreme court, sitting in the county of Columbia, in the third judicial district, in the third judicial department, by an order made after full hearing and consideration, and duly entered in the clerk's office of Albany County, reversed the decision of the secretary of state.

And they took the copies of the decree and stuck them in their pockets and kept them there, and would not let the parties file the decree, and would not obey the court and file it, until Monday.

Mr. HARTMAN. That is the truth about it.

Mr. GAINES. The most outrageous and infernal fraud I ever heard of being perpetrated in a court room.

Mr. HARTMAN. That is right.

Mr. SIMPSON. That was in New York, and not in the South.

Mr. GAINES. No; it would not occur in the South.

Mr. BELFORD. Does the gentleman from Montana deny that on October 17 counsel for both parties appeared before Judge Edwards and in the afternoon of that day the form of the order in behalf of Mr. Ward was finally settled upon and the record of the case signed, that being Saturday?

Mr. HARTMAN. I will say to the gentleman that counsel for the contestee in this case appeared before Judge Edwards on Friday, upon notification——

Mr. BELFORD. Will you answer that question categorically?

Mr. HARTMAN. I will answer that question as I please, and I will answer it fairly. I do not propose to have the gentleman stand there and nag me in an unprofessional or unparliamentary way.

Mr. BELFORD. Oh, no.

Mr. HARTMAN. You have asked a civil question and shall have a civil answer, provided you do not press it in an uncivil manner. I will say to the gentleman frankly that on the 16th of October, which was on Friday, the respective counsel for the contestee and contestant appeared before Judge Edwards. There they contested the question as to whether the order should be issued, or the character of it, and between 5 and 6 o'clock on that afternoon, of Friday, the order was there signed.

Mr. KING. In triplicate.

Mr. HARTMAN. Yes; in triplicate, and they put them in their pockets and denied the right of inspection to the contestant and his attorney.

Mr. BELFORD. I deny that such was the case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. HARTMAN. Has my time expired, Mr. Speaker? I thought I had just commenced.

Mr. GAINES. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. HARTMAN. As I was saying, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GAINES. If the gentleman from Montana will allow me, I will answer the gentleman from New York by reading from the contestee's own brief:

> On October 16 Hon. Samuel Edwards, a justice of the supreme court, sitting in the county of Columbia, in the third judicial district, in the third judicial department, by an order made after full hearing and consideration and duly entered in the clerk's office of Albany County, reversed the decision of the secretary of state, and held that Mr. Ward, having been regularly nominated by the authorized convention, was the regular Republican candidate.

That order was signed in triplicate, given to Mr. Ward's counsel, and they put it in their pockets and carried it off, and although the contestant begged them to file it, they refused to do so.

Mr. HARTMAN. That ought to be sufficient to make every gentleman on this floor vote in favor of the contestant and against the contestee; and if that were not sufficient, I call the attention of the members of this House to the opinion of the court of appeals on page 26 of the record, and I wish you would all read it. That opinion sustains absolutely the contention of the contestant in this case. The court of final resort in the State of New York having complete and final jurisdiction in this case, decided in favor of the contestant.

They hold, first, that Judge Edwards, who entered this order, manifestly illegal and fraudulent, had no jurisdiction to enter the order at all. And therefore it failed for want of jurisdiction. Second, that the contestant, Fairchild, was entitled to have his name placed upon this ballot, and not the contestee. That being the case, gentlemen of the House, what is the status here to-day? There is a statute of the State of New York which specifically designates the manner in which votes shall be cast under the Australian system.

One of them—I will not take the time to read it, for I have but three minutes left, but it will be read by some of the gentlemen who are to follow me—one of them points out the method in which a straight ballot shall be cast in that State, and it shall be done how? I ask your attention. By marking a cross opposite the emblem at the head of the ticket. And when that is done, what does it vote? Not the names on the ticket, but the names of every man regularly nominated, entitled to be on the ticket. That is the gist of this case.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does not the gentleman know that the voter has the right in addition to mark a cross opposite the name of any candidate on the ballot?

Mr. HARTMAN. Certainly, but when a man makes his cross opposite the emblem, he votes the straight ticket. He wanted to vote the straight Republican ticket, and he did not care a continental whose name was on it, whether it was Smith, Jones, Ward, or McGinty. These men stood up and took their medicine in spite of the fact that a man had his name on the ticket by fraudulent and deceitful methods. What does it mean? It means if the House sees fit to establish this precedent, a man can obtain a nomination by resorting to means unlawful and fraudulent, and can be successfully elected. All you have to do is to have a judge susceptible to blandishments and that settles it, because he will put your name on the ticket, and the cross at the head of the ticket elects you.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. GAINES. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAHANY].

[Mr. MAHANY addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. GAINES addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. GAINES. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, unless I am greatly mistaken, this election case demands more attention from this House, and more serious attention, than any election case that has come before it in my long term of service. No man in this House can afford not to give it the most careful attention, and I do not claim that I can begin to do it justice, as I view it, in any remarks I may make. The report of this committee, in my judgment, ought not to meet the approbation of and should not be sustained by this House. It ought to be defeated more than any report from any committee that has been made since I have been a member of the House.

This case, as I view it, is blistered all over with fraudulent intent from first to last. What is there in this case that a member from New York must come to my seat and warn me to keep out of it, saying that they wanted to settle it in the New York delegation and by New York. We have not such admiration for the politics of New York, for the political integrity of New York, or the fairness of New York in her elections that we are bound to sit here dumb while New York is trying a case in this court of last resort of the people.

In the first place, the law of New York says that a cross made at the top of the column of party nominees shall be counted for a vote for the regular nominee of the party. That is the first proposition—that an X at the top of the column of Republicans shall be counted for the legally nominated candidates of the party. I submit that it is a fraud—that if a fraud is perpetrated to get a name into that column of a person that was not legally nominated. All law and all justice in the administration of election laws in this House point to correcting the fraud if there is one, and that the legal nominee of the party shall receive the ballots that are marked with a cross at the top of the column, and not the man whom the appellate court of New York has decided got his name into the column fraudulently. Is not that good law? Is not that sound sense and sound legal doctrine? Is not that the principle upon which we have justly decided election cases in this House heretofore?

Mr. BELFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Not just now; let me open my case first.

Mr. BELFORD. I would like to correct the statement that the gentleman has made with reference to the law of New York.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. If you will let me get my case well opened up—I have got but ten minutes—and then some one may finish it. In the first place, there is no dispute upon this floor about certain facts. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELFORD] if it has not been decided by the courts of New York that Mr. Fairchild was the legal nominee of the Republican party?

Mr. BELFORD. There is no dispute about that.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I want to ask the gentleman further——

Mr. BELFORD. Well, if the gentleman is going to put so many questions to me, will he not allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Yes; I will allow you to ask me a question now if you will not make a speech.

Mr. BELFORD. You have stated the law of New York to be that a mark under the emblem casts a vote for the regular nominee of the party.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I do say so. Let me read:

Section 105 of the New York election laws contains the instructions to the voters in the preparation of their ballots. It provides as follows:

"The elector shall observe the following rules in marking his ballots:

"1. If the elector desires to vote a straight ticket, that is, for each and every candidate of one party for whatever office nominated, he shall make a cross (X) mark in the circle above the name of the party at the head of the ticket."

Mr. BELFORD. The gentleman would not have us infer that that is the only way a voter has for voting?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. No; but I say if a voter does vote in that way and makes his cross at the head of the ticket, that casts a vote for all the nominees of the party.

Mr. BELFORD. Yes; it votes the names under the party emblem.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. No, sir; not for every name under the party emblem. Does the gentleman contend that if a man gets his name printed under there by fraud, the fraud does not vitiate the fact that his name is there?

Mr. BELFORD. We do not concede that.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. You must concede that this candidate Ward took every pains in the world that Fairchild, who was the legally nominated Republican, should not get his legal rights, in having his name printed in its legal place; that he went out of the district in which the nomination occurred, and went into the district where the appellate court did not sit until after the election was to occur.

I never saw a case where lawyers could not make the worse appear the better reason if they only had undisputed sway, and that is the case now on this floor.

Furthermore, Mr. Fairchild advised all his friends to vote the straight ticket, informing them that he would make no contest at the polls, but would appeal to this House for his rights; and that if he failed to secure his rights in this House, his party should not suffer, but should have a man here to cast a Republican vote. He made not the slightest effort to have himself voted for, protesting against his name being put in the column of the independent candidates. These are indisputable facts.

Now, in the election case of Yost I made this declaration:

If the law is violated innocently, even then the election is valid.

But in this case the fraud is on the other party and the law is all in favor of Mr. Fairchild. Furthermore I said:

When the law is violated deliberately and for the deliberate purpose of fraud, then the House can not too emphatically condemn the fraud; and certainly it should never permit deliberate violation of law to be successful.

Now, the obstruction of the law to profit by it is a fraud: and while the contestee in this case observed the forms of law, he so observed them as to practically defeat the spirit and intent of the letter of the law.

Mr. BRUCKER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRUCKER. I understand it is conceded here to-day as a matter of fact and as a matter of law that Mr. Fairchild was the legal nominee of his party.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. It is not disputed by anybody on this floor.

Mr. BELFORD. We do not concede that. What we do concede is that the court of appeals says that.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. The court of appeals says that; and it is a court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. BELFORD. It said that without passing on the merits of the controversy at all.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. The secretary of state did pass on the merits, and the courts of New York have so declared. Does this Elections Committee undertake to traverse the decisions of the New York court?

Mr. BRUCKER. Let me ask a further question, to see whether I understand myself and also the gentleman from Massachusetts. It is conceded, then, that under the facts and under the law as laid down by the court of appeals of the State of New York Mr. Fairchild was regularly nominated——

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. BRUCKER. And his name as the regular nominee should have appeared on the official ballot?

Mr. BELFORD. Let me answer that question——

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I prefer to answer myself a question which is addressed to me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I hope I may have additional time.

Mr. GAINES. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, this appears to be a case of New York dirty politics. Gentlemen here may and do dispute everthing; but it is conceded that the courts of New York, which I have as much confidence in as I have in New York politicians, to say the least [laughter]—it is conceded that Mr. Fairchild was the regular nominee of the straight Republican convention and had a legal right to have his name printed on that ballot, and that by essential fraud his name was kept off that ballot. Under those circumstances Mr. Fairchild said to his friends, "Rather than have my party defeated, vote the straight ticket; and I will appeal to the House of Representatives for my rights and for justice." [Applause.]

Now, will this House sanction fraud? In view of this essential fraud can it say to this country, under these Australian ballots and strict voting laws, that if any man can get his name on the ballot, by fair means or foul, and absolutely prevent the regular nominee from getting his name on, this House will not rectify the wrong? How long can we have decently pure elections under such action of this House? How long will it be an honor to sit in this House? Mr. Speaker, if this policy is to be pursued, you will have a vacant chair here, for I will not contaminate myself by associating with men who are elected on any such fraudulent proceedings. [Laughter and applause.] You may make any demonstrations you choose, gentlemen. My declaration was that if this House is to be filled by members whose elections have been secured by essential fraud, my seat would be vacant. I believe that there was in this case essential fraud from beginning to end. I may be mistaken, but I do not see how I can be with the facts that are before me.

I have only to say again that Mr. Fairchild is conceded by the courts of New York to have been regularly nominated by the straight Republican convention and that the only court that was competent to decide that question has so decided.

Mr. ROYSE. Will the gentleman yield a moment? I know he does not want to be inaccurate.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. No; I do not.

Mr. ROYSE. There were two courts that decided the other way.

Mr. GAINES. But they were intermediate courts.

Mr. ROYSE. I know that; I am not going to misstate anything; but I want the gentleman from Massachusetts to be correct. Judge Edwards decided, after hearing all the evidence, that Mr. Ward was the nominee, and so did the supreme court of New York.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Now, I want to say that when a man goes out of his own district—goes a hundred miles to get a particular judge to decide a case of this kind, in the State of New York, with its political status and conduct, and allows his decision to pass several days without record, I have not the slightest confidence in the decision, I do not care who the judge may be. Furthermore, if Mr. Ward's counsel and friends had had any confidence in the correctness of that decision, they would have made all haste to record it and give Mr. Fairchild a fair chance to have it reviewed by the superior court. And the gentleman does not claim, and no other man claims, that they took any pains or made any haste to give Mr. Fairchild a fair chance to have that decision reviewed, but quite the contrary.

Mr. ROYSE. No; I contend just the contrary.

Mr. GAINES. He would have had it reviewed if the papers had not been stuck in the pockets of an individual and carried a hundred miles or more away.

Mr. FOOTE. I do not think the gentleman from Massachusetts means to impeach the whole bar and the integrity of the courts of New York, as in his last statement he seems inclined to do. He says that this gentleman went a hundred miles to get fair play and a fair judge. Now, in the name of the State of New York and the bar of the State, I do not like that sort of an assertion to be made on the floor of the House without comment.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Well, Mr. Speaker, whether he likes it or not, he will have to take it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FOOTE. Oh, well, I do take it, coming from the source and influenced by the judgment the gentleman has usually shown on this floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Well, you are not the first New Yorker who has undertaken to amplify himself on this floor to the exclusion of and as superior to everybody else. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. ROYSE. I yield twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE].

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, so far as the parties to this controversy are concerned if I am at all influenced by any personal feeling, it is in favor of the contestant, Mr. Fairchild. He was a member of the Fifty-fourth Congress with me. I found him to be a very fair, high-minded, and honorable man. I have a very high opinion of Mr. Fairchild and practically no acquaintance with Mr. Ward, the contestee.

In reaching the conclusion that Mr. Fairchild was not elected and that Mr. Ward was elected my judgment, so far from being controlled by my feelings, is contrary to their suggestions.

My judgment is based wholly upon my view of the facts and the law, without regard to the parties, uninfluenced by the factional fight in the Republican party of New York or by any other purpose or motive.

It will be impossible to deal with the whole case in the time at my disposal; nor is it necessary, since the chairman of our committee [Mr. ROYSE] has so fully covered the ground. I will therefore deal but briefly and hurriedly with what may be properly called the history of the case, concerning which there is little dispute, and get as speedily as possible to the real and controlling issues.

In 1894 the regular Republican convention of the district in question (the Sixteenth Congressional district of New York) appointed a committee to provide for the election of the next Congressional district convention. That committee called an election early in 1896 for a district convention to nominate delegates to the Republican national convention. The convention so elected appointed a new committee to provide for the election of the next Congressional convention for that district. It was and is asserted that the spring convention had no power to appoint a new committee—that its functions began and ended with the election of delegates to the national convention. The old committee, therefore, ignoring the new committee, proceeded to call a convention for the nomination of a Representative in Congress. The new committee contested the jurisdiction of the old committee and also called a convention, elected under its auspices for the same purpose. The latter convention nominated Mr. Ward, while the former convention nominated Mr. Fairchild, as the candidate of the Republican party.

Mr. Fairchild and his supporters contended that the spring convention, appointed to elect delegates to the national convention, usurped power and exceeded its functions in appointing the new district committee.

Out of that dispute the whole controversy in this case has arisen. The old committee, appointed by the regular district convention of 1894, would seem by the terms of its appointment to be authorized to provide for the election of the next convention to nominate a candidate in Congress. That literal authority supports Mr. Fairchild's contention.

The contention of Mr. Ward, on the other hand, is supported by the course pursued by the Republican organization in the campaign of 1892, in which the convention appointed to select delegates to the national convention appointed a district committee, under whose auspices a Congressional convention to nominate a candidate for Congress was elected. There is a dispute, and a very serious one, as to the practices and customs of the Republican party in New York with respect to these conventions in Presidential election years prior to 1892. In all other election years the custom contended for by Mr. Fairchild as a law of the Republican party of New York was followed.

However, a substantial controversy was thus presented between these parties, to be determined, first, by the regular tribunals of the Republican party; next, in the case of the Congressional nomination, to be determined by the secretary of state of the State of New York; and finally, if appealed, by the courts.

Mr. Fairchild's case was never before any of the tribunals of the Republican party to be decided. But other nominations made by conventions called under the auspices of what is known as the Fairchild committee—the old committee—were held by the tribunals of the Republican party to have been regular. To that extent the tribunals of the Republican party have decided in favor of Mr. Fairchild. The secretary of state, whether upon his independent judgment or following what he understood to be the decisions of these tribunals in analogous cases, held Mr. Fairchild to be the regular nominee of the Republican party for Representative in Congress.

Immediately upon that decision of the secretary of state, Mr. Ward, in accordance with the laws of New York, appealed, or, speaking more technically, by writ of review proceeded to get the judgment of the supreme court of the State of New York upon the question presented by the contest concerning his candidacy.

At that point a very serious question arising upon the construction of the then recently enacted statute of New York was presented. It was this: The statute required that the proceedings should be brought either before the supreme court or a justice of the supreme court within the district, or a county court within the county, and the question arose as to what judicial district was meant by the statute and consequently as to what justice of the supreme court would have jurisdiction of the case under that law.

Mr. Ward's attorneys decided that the justice of the supreme court of the third judicial district, within which district the secretary of state whose decision was to be reviewed had his office and residence, was the justice before whom the proceeding should be brought.

The question was a new one. It had not previously been authoritatively decided, and it seems to me that there can be no proper criticism of Mr. Ward's attorneys in the matter of selecting the court or the district in which they brought the proceedings to review the action of the secretary of state.

It has been charged that these gentlemen went 100 miles out of the Sixteenth Congressional district in order to get their case before a judge of their own selection, the intimation, if not the express declaration, being that they went 100 miles out of the Congressional district for the purpose of getting the case before a corrupt judge who would decide in their favor, whether they were right or wrong. The record does not justify any such accusation or intimation.

Mr. HARTMAN. Has there been any such criticism as that?

Mr. MAGUIRE. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] and others have made it.

Mr. HARTMAN. I take it not. I do not think there has been any suggestion of collusion.

Mr. MAGUIRE. So far as the gentleman from Montana was concerned there was not.

Mr. GAINES. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, the fact is that when Mr. Ward wanted to bring a suit in which he wanted to get quick relief—that is, when he attempted to get Mr. Fairchild off the ticket as an independent, he began his suit at home and got the adjudication, but lost it.

Mr. HARTMAN. There was no supreme court sitting in the district in which that county was situated.

Mr. GAINES. There was no supreme court sitting in the third circuit at all; there was in the second circuit.

Mr. MAGUIRE. The court of appeals has jurisdiction over the entire State.

Mr. GAINES. Yes.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to make just one statement?

Mr. MAGUIRE. Let me finish this statement and then I will yield to the gentleman. Now, I say there was a very serious question as to what district the statute required the proceeding to be brought in. It was a new question, and in my opinion if I had been acting for Mr. Ward I should have deemed it safer to commence the proceeding in the third judicial district than in the judicial district in which the Congressional district was situated.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I want to say that I did not charge fraud or anything of the kind. There are a great many mistakes made which come a good deal short of fraud.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Well, that may be, but the gentleman made a pretty strong statement if he intended only to criticise mistakes. Judge Edwards was not selected for any such reason as has been intimated.

Now, Mr. Fairchild, who is a lawyer, and a pretty good lawyer, in his petition to the supreme court of the State of New York, verified by him and filed on the 17th day of October, 1896, said upon this subject:

That the statute under which this proceeding was instituted and the questions raised upon said hearing before said Mr. Justice Edwards is a new statute, passed in the year 1896, and, as affiant is advised and verily believes, the questions arising herein have never been determined or decided by any other judge or court other than at the hearing above referred to.

So that the charge of bad faith in going to the Albany district comes to naught.

According to the decision of the supreme court of New York, the parties made a mistake in going to that district, but the error in selecting that tribunal was nothing more than a mistake.

Mr. SHANNON. The court of appeals said that.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Yes; I should have said the court of appeals. The supreme court held that Justice Edwards had jurisdiction and affirmed his decision.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this writ of review was brought before Justice Edwards on the 14th day of October, 1896, and criticism is made upon Judge Edwards and upon the attorneys for contestee for the delay occurring between the 14th day of October, when the matter was brought to the attention of Judge Edwards, and the 19th of October, when Judge Edwards's final order was entered of record.

On the 14th of October the parties appeared, and at the request of Mr. Fairchild's attorneys Judge Edwards continued the case for one day. That continuance was certainly not to be charged to any purpose of delay on the part of Judge Edwards or the attorneys of the contestee. The judge continued it one day to accommodate contestant's counsel. On the 15th of October Judge Edwards took the matter up at chambers, heard the arguments, took it under advisement, and on the next day, the 16th of October, he rendered his decision in favor of Mr. Ward and against Mr. Fairchild, reversing the action of the secretary of state. Certainly in a case presenting a number of new questions of law, upon a new statute passed in that very year and raising questions not previously determined by the courts of New York, if Judge Edwards had any corrupt, or even faintly improper, purpose of injuring the contestant by delay, he might well have held that case under advisement for more than one day. He decided it on the day after it was presented to him and submitted for decision.

Mr. GAINES. Then why did the counsel not file the decree, but hold it out three whole days?

Mr. MAGUIRE. I am coming to that. Not only did Judge Edwards decide the case the day following its presentation and submission to him, but he came back on the night of the 16th and sat well into the hours of the night with counsel for both parties, going over his decision and preparing his order and signing it.

As to the events between that time and noon of the next day, there is a conflict in the testimony. Certain it is that the order could not have been filed on the night of the 16th of October, because the order was not complete until near 6 o'clock on that night, long after the clerk's office had closed.

On the following morning there was a question raised as to the correctness of the order, as to the completeness of the order, for the purpose of appeal. Mr. Fairchild, as I remember, was not mentioned as a party to the proceeding. When that matter was determined on Saturday morning I am not prepared to say from the record, because the testimony concerning that matter is so involved with the testimony concerning the settlement and signing of another paper by Judge Edwards, the statement of record of appeal in the case, that I am not clear as to when the order was finally settled. But on the morning of the 17th of October Judge Edwards certified an affidavit of Mr. Bevans, who claimed to represent Mr. Fairchild, although he was not one of Mr. Fairchild's attorneys of record in the case, in which Bevans set forth that the order of Judge Edwards had not been filed and that the attorneys for the contestee were delaying the filing of the order.

Judge Edwards for some reason declined to interfere in that matter, probably upon the assurance given by contestee's attorneys that they would file the order the first thing on Monday morning. It is claimed that they refused to file it on Saturday and that Judge Edwards refused to order it filed on Saturday. The importance of these statements, if true, are greatly minimized by the fact that under the laws of New York the office of the county clerk and the office of the clerk of the court are closed every Saturday at noon, Saturday afternoon being a half holiday under the laws of the State of New York.

The reason given for not filing it on Saturday was that the office of the clerk of court was closed before they could file it, and this leaves open the question as to their delay—from 9 o'clock in the morning on Saturday, when they might have filed the order if it was finished and in a perfected condition, and 12 o'clock noon on Saturday, when the office closed under the law. Three hours' delay. I do not pretend or attempt to excuse the attorneys for Mr. Ward upon any showing contained in the record in delaying the matter even for three hours, but I say the showing of willful delay is reduced to three hours, and no more, because the order could not have been filed until after 9 o'clock on the morning of Saturday and could not have been filed after 12 o'clock noon of that day until it was actually filed on the following Monday morning.

An appeal was taken to the appellate division of the supreme court from the decision of Judge Edwards. Mr. Fairchild had a hearing before the appellate division of the supreme court, and that court reviewed and affirmed Judge Edwards's decision. That court upheld Judge Edwards on the question of jurisdiction and on the question of law decided by him. Mr. Fairchild had the benefit of that appeal to the supreme court, and the decision of that court, reviewing Judge Edwards's decision, in ample time before the election, notwithstanding the delay of which he complains.

Mr. Fairchild then attempted to get into the court of appeals, a proceeding that, in my opinion, was not contemplated by either party while the matter was before Judge Edwards. Why should it have been contemplated, since each party expected that the appellate division of the supreme court would decide in his favor if the case got there. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], my colleague on the committee, says that Mr. Fairchild lost ten days in getting before the supreme court through Judge Edwards's delay. No; at the most he lost but two days.

Mr. GAINES. I said by this suit being illegally carried to that district.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I will answer that. At most he lost two days. The gentleman says he lost ten days getting the court together, because the supreme court of that district was not in session. That was not the way in which the loss of ten days occurred. The law of New York requires ten days' notice to be given of a hearing in the appellate division of the supreme court, and he lost ten days in giving that notice and getting the matter properly up for hearing in the appellate division. He would have been required to give the same notice and suffer the same delay, within two days, if the court had been in session.

Now, suppose that contestant was deprived of his place on the regular Republican ticket by mistake—by erroneous decisions. Suppose Judge Edwards was without jurisdiction. Suppose the secretary of state made a mistake in obeying the order of Judge Edwards, as confirmed by the appellate division of the supreme court. Then it would follow simply that the secretary of state, by an honest mistake of law, put Ward's name on the ticket illegally in place of Fairchild's.

What are the legal consequences of that mistake, in the absence of any showing of fraud on the part of contestee or any of the public officers and in the absence of any showing that any voter was deceived or misled by it?

What was the result? Thirty thousand seven hundred and nine electors voluntarily and knowingly voted for Mr. Ward, as against 770 for contestee. If his name was illegally placed upon the ballot, then I admit that if any voter in the district was deceived by that mistake and was induced to vote that ticket under the belief, based upon the legal duty of the secretary of state, that Fairchild's name was there or that Ward's name was not there—if any voter so believing had come forward and testified to that effect, it would have been the duty of our committee, and it would now be the duty of the House, to take that vote away from Ward; and if there were enough voters deceived by that mistake of the secretary of state, then Ward should be unseated.

But there is no such showing. Not a man of all the witnesses called—not a man of the contestant's one hundred witnesses—testifies that he was deceived or misled or that anybody else was deceived or misled. Every one of those one hundred men testifies that he knew Ward's name was upon the ticket and voted the straight ticket knowing that Ward's name was there, although he personally preferred Fairchild to Ward.

Mr. HARTMAN. Is it not also a fact that a large number of those witnesses—at least seventy-five—testify that they voted for Mr. Ward because he was the regular Republican nominee, but would have preferred to vote for Mr. Fairchild had he been the regular nominee?

Mr. MAGUIRE. Oh, yes; my recollection is that every one of the men called by Mr. Fairchild testified that he would have preferred Fairchild to Ward; that he voted for Ward because Ward's name had been put upon the ticket as the regular nominee by the decision of the supreme court. But the fact remains that they did knowingly vote for Ward.

Mr. HARTMAN. In other words, they were ready to vote for the Republican nominee, no matter what his name was?

Mr. MAGUIRE. No; I do not recognize any such presumption as that; and even if it were material, it does not so appear from the evidence. A voter must be held to have meant to do what he actually did.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GAINES. I now yield ten minutes to Mr. Fairchild, the contestant.

Mr. FAIRCHILD (the contestant). Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that in view of the voluminous record in this case, out of which have grown so many statements pro and con on this floor, I would have had an opportunity to go somewhat fully into the facts as they occurred in that district, so that the House could know, by one who was on the ground at the time, what the facts were as they transpired during that Congressional contest. But in the short time that remains under the arrangement for a vote it will be impossible for me to do so. Hence it becomes necessary for me to confine myself almost exclusively to one or two points, and for the opportunity to do this I gratefully acknowledge my indebtedness to the courtesy of the House.

In the first place, however, I desire while I have it in mind to answer one or two statements which the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE] has just made, because I know he would not have the House misunderstand the facts. He stated that there was one day lost by the application of contestant's attorneys, the fact being, as he will probably recall, that the time fixed for the first hearing before Judge Edwards was at 2 o'clock one afternoon; that it was a case which would and did take all of one day; that the case was adjourned till 10 o'clock the following morning, and did take all of that day.

Mr. MAGUIRE. That is true, as I recollect.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Now, the other statement is that the judge who signed the final order reversing the decision of the secretary of state signed that order within twenty-four hours after the hearing.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I said on the next day.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. The gentleman said on the next day, the fact being that the argument concluded in the afternoon of one day and the order was signed between 5 and 6 o'clock the second day thereafter.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Oh, no.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. The hearing was on the 14th of October and the order was signed on the 16th.

Mr. MAGUIRE. The gentleman must be mistaken about that.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I have in my hand the record which was before the court of appeals of the proceedings before Judge Edwards, which shows that the order was returnable before Judge Edwards at 2 o'clock on the 13th of October; that the hearing was adjourned till 10 o'clock on the morning of the 14th of October, and that the order was signed, as the gentleman from California will concede, between 5 and 6 o'clock on the 16th of October, as shown by the date of the order itself.

Mr. MAGUIRE. That is the date of the order.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Now, the other point to which I wish to direct the attention of the House is as to the facts relating to the nomination and to the proceedings before Judge Edwards. At the time the Congressional convention was called in that district by the committee that was appointed for that purpose by the last Congressional convention which nominated me in 1894, the primaries had already been held in the district, and out of those primaries there had arisen certain contests. Those contests had come before the Republican State committee of New York, and were by that committee decided unanimously in my favor. They had come before the Republican State convention in New York and were by it decided unanimously in my favor.

And they had come before the Republican judiciary convention in the judicial district, and by that convention also decided unanimously in my favor. And that was the situation existing at the time the Congressional committee called the Congressional convention. What followed? Mr. Ward, the contestee, associated with him a Mr. Henderson, who appears in this contest as his attorney, and proceeded to secure an independent nomination by petition, for the avowed purpose of compassing the defeat of the Republican nominee, as testified to in this contest by Mr. Henderson when on the witness stand—to elect the Democrat for the sake of beating the Republican nominee in that election.'

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman allow me a moment to say that if they had filed a suit in the second circuit you could have got it to the court of appeals in time?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES. And the whole contention here grows out of the fact that this delay occurred through no fault of yours.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Certainly. The court was sitting in the other district, and there need have been no delay whatever.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that was the situation when Mr. Ward obtained the independent nomination, for the purpose, as his attorney testifies, to defeat the Republican candidate and to elect the Democrat in that election. And right here let me say that simultaneously therewith contestee had a convention called by an unauthorized committee, which committee was appointed without the knowledge of anyone throughout the district, at a convention held the spring previous for the sole purpose of electing delegates to the national convention. There assembled, in pursuance of such unauthorized call, the contesting delegates whose claims had been adversely decided upon by the unanimous decision of the Republican State committee of the Republican State convention and of the Republican judiciary convention—unanimously by every committee and convention where the matter was considered.

Only six uncontested delegates in the whole district participated in that convention with those defeated contestants. As I have said, he held that pretended convention simultaneously with procuring the independent nomination, and based upon the action of that alleged convention, he filed a certificate with the secretary of state of the State of New York claiming to be the regular Republican nominee for Congress. Under the election law such a contest must be decided, "in the first instance, by the officer with whom the certificates are filed," which in this case was the secretary of state. The law of New York further requires that the decision of the secretary shall be made in writing.

After a full hearing the secretary of state did render a decision in writing, and decided that this contestant was the Republican nominee and entitled to have his name printed upon the regular Republican ticket. Under the law, Mr. Speaker, when such a decision as that is made the defeated party can appeal to a judge, as the law provides, "within the judicial district." It was a subsequent decision of the New York court of appeals, unanimously rendered, which held that this meant the judicial district within which the Congressional district was located, where the controversy arose and where the parties resided.

Now, 100 miles away from that Congressional district was the Third judicial district. In that judicial district there was no appellate division of the court in session. If there had been, there would have been no contest before this House. And why? Because we could have reached the court of appeals in time to have it determine the matter before the day of election. In the Second judicial district, having exclusive jurisdiction, there was an appellate division in session to hear an appeal and to render a decision in time for election day, as was done in an assembly case in the same district, and involving the same primary contests. The unanimous decision of the appellate division of the second department in the assembly case was in favor of the Fairchild candidate, whose name accordingly appeared on the ballot, and he was elected.

I will come now to the delays that occurred in the Third judicial district where contestee resorted, in addition to the delay resulting from no appellate division being in session in that district. That hearing, as I have already stated, occurred upon the 14th of October, and between 5 and 6 o'clock on the 16th of October Judge Edwards's order was signed, reversing the decision of the secretary of state and substituting the name of Mr. Ward in the place of the name of Mr. Fairchild in the Republican column. My own attorney was present at the time the order was signed. It was signed in triplicate, at the request of Mr. Ward's attorneys. My attorney immediately requested the judge that, as the time was so short——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I move that the gentleman's time be extended twenty minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] has control of the time on that side.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I move that the vote be postponed for twenty minutes.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I ask that I may have ten minutes.

Mr. GAINES. I have not ten minutes to yield to the gentleman. If I had, I would do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] has control of the time on that side.

Mr. GAINES. I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended ten minutes, and that the gentleman have that time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that the time of the order for taking the vote be extended ten minutes, and that that time be given to the contestant [Mr. Fairchild].

Mr. ROYSE. I object, unless the time——

Mr. HOOKER. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOOKER].

Mr. GAINES. I have only six minutes remaining. I yield three minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. It is impossible in three minutes' time to make a statement of the delay that occurred during those three days. My attorney was there between 5 and 6 o'clock on the evening of Friday, the 16th, when the order was signed, and he appealed to the judge to have the order entered immediately, because the time was so short within which an appeal could be taken.

Mr. GAINES. If it had been entered immediately you would have obtained the relief you wanted.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Yes. And this contest would not be here now, because the decision of the court of appeals was in my favor.

Mr. SHANNON. That is the point.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. My attorney requested that one of the three copies be given to him so that he could enter it, and they objected to that and the judge refused that. Then the judge left the court room. My attorney followed Mr. Ward's attorney outside and asked him if he would not be allowed to read the order, and Mr. Ward's attorney refused even an inspection of the order. My attorney then telephoned to me at Albany what had occurred. I said to him, "You go to the judge's house and appeal to him again. He can not refuse the immediate entry of that order in view of the fact that the time is so short before the election."

He went to the judge's house and called the attention of the judge to the fact that he had been refused a copy of the order by Mr. Ward's attorneys, and that he had been refused even an inspection of the order. The judge again refused a direction for the entry of the order, and the most he would do was to say that we could come before him at 9 o'clock the next morning. We then telephoned to my counsel, Gen. Benjamin F. Tracy, of New York City. General Tracy took the midnight train from New York on Friday night, after these refusals for the entry of the order, came to Hudson, and we appeared before Judge Edwards at 9 o'clock the next morning. We had then an affidavit drawn by my attorney, stating that the order had not been entered, and that affidavit is in evidence in this case, with Judge Edwards's signature attached to it, because it was sworn to before him at 9 o'clock that morning.

The office of the Hudson County clerk was only three minutes' walk from there. We called the judge's attention to that, and called his attention to the code of New York, requiring that the order be entered, and asked that the judge direct its entry in that county clerk's office, as we had a right to have it entered. The New York code says that such an order must be entered immediately. We opened the code before the judge and called his attention to another provision that when it is not entered immediately the judge who granted the order must make a direction requiring its entry. The judge refused that, and we were all that day, from 9 o'clock Saturday morning till 5 o'clock in the evening, appealing in vain and failing to get the entry of that order. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROYSE. Let me inquire how much time I have remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana has fifteen minutes remaining.

Mr. GAINES. I yield three minutes of my time, the balance of my time, to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has only two minutes remaining.

Mr. GAINES. I understood that I had six minutes, and I gave three to the contestant, Mr. Fairchild.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman occupied four minutes. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, it is not possible in that brief time fairly to state the case, much less argue it. If I had time to state the case I would endeavor to begin it in this way: Mr. Fairchild and Mr. Ward each claimed to be the Republican nominee. The matter was carried to the highest court of resort in the State of New York and the decision was that Mr. Fairchild was the nominee. In the meantime, by an erroneous decision, Ward's name had been placed on the Republican ticket, and those voting the Republican ticket had voted for him as the regular nominee. Under this condition of things, if Ward is elected, then it is more than possible under the Australian ballot system for a person to be elected who, by any manner of means, gets his name upon the regular party ticket, if enough votes are cast for the regular ticket, thus giving him a larger number of votes than his competitor.

The voter must take his chance of destroying his ballot by changing it or he must vote for all the persons on the ticket, in order to make good what those called upon to administer the law have made bad. It is the duty of the State to furnish a correct ballot. When the State fails to do that and when as a result of it the person whose name is wrongfully on the ballot has received the number of votes which, if rightfully cast for him would elect, he ought to be deprived of the office. [Applause.]

Mr. ROYSE. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELFORD].

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Speaker, if I rightly conceive the functions of a committee on contested elections it is to view the testimony submitted to it without bias, with minds totally disabused of prejudice, and to reach a conclusion based upon such premises as that. I believe that the Committee on Elections of which I have the honor to be a member have all of them proceeded in that spirit in the consideration of this case. I think that the gentleman who presented the minority report here has been actuated by pure motives—that he has given expression to his honest convictions from a study of this case. Now, this case came to our committee under charges of such gross fraud and irregularity on the one hand, and under such a claim of political purity and virtue upon the other, that if there was any prejudice existing in the minds of this committee at all it certainly at the outset was favorable to Mr. Fairchild and against Mr. Ward.

But I ask this House if it is not a significant fact that eight other gentlemen, aside from the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], men of at least average intelligence, men with motives equally as pure as those of the gentleman from Tennessee, men with precisely the same opportunities of investigation, having studied this case from beginning to end, eight men on that committee come to this House and say that they find that the charge of fraud is absolutely groundless. I ask you at least to give as much weight to the judgment of the eight men on the committee, who say the case is free from fraud, free from intentional trickery, as you will give to the minority report of one.

Mr. HARTMAN. Will the gentleman submit to a question?

Mr. BELFORD. No; I have only fifteen minutes.

Mr. HARTMAN. I submitted to several questions from the gentleman.

Mr. BELFORD. I have only a short time, and I must proceed. Now, let us proceed in order in this matter and see what these charges of fraud are. The first charge of fraud is in the calling of the fall Congressional convention. It is avowed that the Congressional committee which called the convention had no authority to call it whatever. Let us see if the history of the Republican politics in that Congressional district will bear out that accusation.

There is in evidence here—I concede that there is some conflict on this point, but we have the affidavit of Judge Robertson, of that district, a man who has been closely identified with every political movement in the district for twenty years or more; a man of unimpeachable integrity; a man who to-day is regarded, and has been for forty years, I am told, as a representative Republican in that district, and he says that at each Congressional convention so far back as his memory runs a committee was delegated and appointed to call the next Congressional convention.

Now, if we are to accept that affidavit as true, then the Congressional convention that selected a committee in the spring of 1896 did not transcend its power, and was within its proper jurisdiction, in naming a committee to call the fall convention. That is all they did.

A strong point was attempted to be made here on the fact that contesting delegations from some assembly districts were granted seats in the State convention and in the judiciary convention; but I want to emphasize this fact, that the question of the regularity of the committee which called the fall Congressional convention of 1896 was submitted to the State committee of the State of New York, and the chairman of the executive committee of that State committee declined to have the State committee called together for the purpose of passing upon it, stating to the person who made the application that they had foreclosed their case by having acquiesced in the appointment of that committee for that purpose in the early spring convention.

The next allegation of fraud is that the contestee in this case went 100 miles away to find a justice before whom he could bring his appeal from the order of the secretary of state directing that the name of Mr. Fairchild should go upon the ticket as the regular party nominee. Let me read for the information of the House the section of the law of New York defining the judicial district in which this proceeding should be brought:

> The supreme court or any justice thereof—

Observe the language—

> The supreme court or any justice thereof within the judicial district—

Not defining the judicial district, observe—> within the judicial district, or any county judge within his county, shall have jurisdiction, etc.

Now, what judicial district? I appeal to every clear-headed lawyer on this floor whether there is not sufficient ambiguity in the reading of that section to fairly raise the question what judicial district is meant by the section?

Mr. HARTMAN. Does the gentleman reverse the decision of the court of appeals?

Mr. BELFORD. Oh, no. Let me go on. I will come to the court of appeals in a few moments.

Now, the attorneys for Mr. Ward, reading that section of the law, made that inquiry—What judicial district? Two things could guide them or govern them. One, what were the precedents in similar cases, and the other, what is a fair construction of the statute itself. Now, as to the precedents in the case, I think I rightly state the fact when I say that every precedent up to that time was in favor of bringing this proceeding in the judicial district in which the secretary of state resided.

Furthermore, look at the question from the statute itself. This was an appeal from an order of the secretary of state. Now, what is natural under the circumstances? Nothing, it seems to me, would be natural except to bring the appeal in the district in which the officer from whose order the appeal is brought resides; and he is the only person, by the way, who is made a party to the proceedings by the statute itself—the secretary of state. This question the court of appeals has now finally settled; but I submit that the determination of the proper judicial district, prior to the decision of the court of appeals, was at least open to an honest difference of interpretation.

Now, I go further. I think I have sufficiently disposed of the question as to whether or not, upon the view of the statute, before we reach the decision of the court of appeals, Judge Edwards had or had not jurisdiction. Upon that case the appeal was taken. Justice Edwards having jurisdiction of the law and the facts, decided in favor of the regularity of Mr. Ward's nomination. The case was taken to the appellate division of the supreme court of our State; and that court, composed of five judges having jurisdiction of the law and the facts, decided unanimously that Mr. Ward was legally nominated in that Congressional district.

Now, I want to call the attention of the House to a provision of the constitution of the State of New York which makes the deliverance of the court of appeals in this case entirely obiter dictum as to the regularity or irregularity of the nomination of either party to this contest. The constitution of the State of New York provides that when the appellate division of the supreme court, except in a case involving a judgment of death, has unanimously passed upon the facts involved in any controversy, the facts are no longer within the jurisdiction of the court of appeals; that the court of appeals then passes simply and solely upon the questions of law that may be involved in the case.

So that as a matter of fact, whether or not Mr. Ward was regularly nominated was not properly before the court of appeals; and that court very clearly defined its position in saying that the case might be of sufficient importance for future guidance to warrant the court of appeals in settling the procedure in similar contests in that direction. But the only question properly before the court of appeals was the question as to the jurisdiction of Justice Edwards to entertain this proceeding. The court of appeals was precluded by the constitution of New York from passing upon the facts of Mr. Ward's nomination. What they said on that subject was wholly and absolutely obiter dictum.

Now, gentlemen, much has been said here to-day with reference to the opportunity of the voter to vote under the election statutes of the State of New York. The legislature of that State certainly never contemplated passing a statute which would make automata of its voters. They certainly never contemplated the passing of a statute which would take away from a voter the exercise of his free will and free choice under the ballot law. And they have not done so.

We have had the Australian ballot system in operation so long in the State of New York that I venture the statement that there is not a voter in the State who, when he takes his ballot into the booth, does not know exactly what it means—does not know exactly how, if he wants to vote for every man on his party ticket, he can do so—does not know exactly how, if he wants to vote for every man on his party ticket except one, he can do so. There can not be any reasonable contention here that a single man who went into the election booth and voted for Mr. Ward might not have voted for Mr. Fairchild, if he had wanted to do so.

I say it is a strange proposition to present to this House, that when 30,000 bona fide electors, using a ballot against which there is not the faintest suggestion of fraud upon the face of it, went into the booths and made their mark upon the ballots as qualified electors, registering their will by so doing—it is a monstrous proposition to ask this House that those 30,000 votes shall be bodily lifted from the emblem under which they appear and from the man for whom they were cast and transferred to another emblem, so that they may be counted for a man for whom they were not cast.

Gentlemen, I know no higher law than the registered will of a supreme and sovereign people. That is higher even than the decisions of courts of appeals. And I tell you that the 30,000 voters who cast these votes are entitled to some respect here even above the deliverance of the court of appeals, whose decision was based on facts not properly presented before the court and in an opinion delivered more than two months after the election was held.

Gentlemen, let us make no mistake in a matter of this kind. If the voters of the Sixteenth Congressional district of the State of New York had desired the return of Mr. Fairchild to the House, they could have accomplished that result. The votes he received are the measure of the voters' desire in that district to have him represent them. And the 30,000 votes that William L. Ward received are but an expression of the Republican people's desire of that district as to whom they wish as their Representative.

Whatever you do to-day, do not, I pray you, reverse the specifically declared will of 30,000 electors in the great State of New York. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. ROYSE. Mr. Speaker, I call for the previous question on the adoption of the report of the committee.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The resolutions were again read.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, can the resolutions be divided?

The SPEAKER. They can.

Mr. GAINES. I call for a division of the resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the first resolution, the gentleman from Tennessee asking a division.

Mr. GAINES. I desire to offer the minority report as a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is now too late. The previous question has been ordered; and the question is on agreeing to the first resolution reported from the Committee on Elections, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Ben L. Fairchild was not elected to the Fifty-fifth Congress from the Sixteenth Congressional district of New York, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GAINES) there were—ayes 162, noes 30.

So the first resolution was adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the second resolution.

The second resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That William L. Ward was elected to the Fifty-fifth Congress from the Sixteenth Congressional district of New York, and is entitled to a seat therein.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GAINES) there were—ayes 138, noes 42.

So the second resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. ROYSE, a motion to reconsider the last votes taken was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. NORTON of South Carolina, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. LINNEY, for three days, on account of important business.

And then, on motion of Mr. ROYSE (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive and other communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

I ask that the joint resolution be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and in connection therewith the paper which I present, giving the capacity of the various hospitals and quarantine stations, be printed as a document and referred to the same committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, in the absence of objection. Is there objection to printing as a document the paper referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEWIS KYLE.

Mr. PENROSE. The bill (S. 4248) for the relief of Lewis Kyle, of Milton, Pa., was introduced by me on the 24th of March last and was improperly referred to the Committee on Claims. I ask unanimous consent that that committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GALLINGER. In this connection I suggest to Senators that in drafting pension bills it is much better to state that it is a bill for a pension or an increase of pension rather than for the relief of the claimant. The Committee on Pensions is engaged in the work of amending the titles of all such bills. If Senators will remember this, it will save the improper reference of pension bills.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the change of reference suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and it is made.

PRINTING OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the immediate use of the Senate 2,000 copies of the message of the President of the United States of April 11, 1898, on the relations of the United States to Spain, and 2,000 copies of the consular correspondence respecting the condition of the reconcentrados in Cuba, the state of war on that island, and the prospects of the projected autonomy, said copies to be delivered to the Senate document room.

Mr. GORMAN subsequently said: I ask that the vote by which the Senate agreed to the resolution ordering the printing of 2,000 copies of the President's message be reconsidered, for the purpose of striking out the words "Senate document room" and inserting "folding room," so that when they are printed each Senator will get his exact quota.

Mr. COCKRELL. He will get them from the document room much easier.

Mr. GORMAN. No.

Mr. COCKRELL. If they are printed for the use of the Senate, they go to the Senate document room and are distributed precisely as they are from the folding room.

Mr. GORMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon about that.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know it. We have had a sample recently with the Maine report. Five hundred copies of it were printed and sent to the Senate document room. There they are, twenty-one set aside for each Senator. When you print a document the first print of it is distributed and goes all around, but when you reprint a document for a specific use it is entirely different.

Mr. GORMAN. Then I withdraw the motion, at the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri.

BELT RAILWAY.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move that the bill (H. R. 8541) to define the rights of purchasers of the Belt Railway, and for other purposes, be reprinted with an additional amendment reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, and that the bill retain its place on the Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McBRIDE introduced a bill (S. 4406) for the relief of Harvey W. Gillingham; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LINDSAY. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask be read at length and lie on the table.

The joint resolution (S. R. 144) to define the mode of proposed military operations in the Island of Cuba, and to secure the independence of the Cuban Republic, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, First. That the contemplated military operations against the Spanish armies on the Island of Cuba should be carried on in concert with the military forces under the command of Gen. Maximo Gomez, such concert to be secured through arrangements between this Government and the Cuban revolutionary authorities recognized by said Gomez, and that any offer looking to such arrangements that may be made by those authorities should be favorably considered, provided it shall concede to the commanding officer of the United States troops the right to control and direct all military operations.

Second. That all such military operations should be carried on to the end that the independence of the Cuban Republic may be secured.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. LINDSAY subsequently said: I wish to give notice that at the close of the morning business to-morrow I shall ask permission of the Senate to submit some remarks on the joint resolution I introduced to-day.

Mr. WILSON. I introduce a joint resolution which I ask be read at length, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The joint resolution (S. R. 145) authorizing the President to take such steps as are necessary to put an end to hostilities in Cuba, and to establish a republican form of government on that island, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the conditions which for three years past have prevailed, and are now prevailing in the Island of Cuba, have become intolerable to the people of the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is empowered and directed to take at once such steps as may be necessary to put an end to hostilities in the Island of Cuba, and to secure to the inhabitants of that island a stable and independent republican form of government, and the President of the United States is empowered and directed to use, if necessary, the land and naval forces of the United States to make this joint resolution effective.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ALLEN. I introduce a joint resolution which I ask be read at length and lie over under the rule until to-morrow morning.

The joint resolution (S. R. 146) declaring the existence of war between the United States of America and the Kingdom of Spain, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a state of war exists between the United States of America and the Kingdom of Spain, and that the political existence and national independence of the Republic of Cuba, now and for some time maintained by force of arms, is hereby recognised; that the President is empowered and directed to at once take such effectual steps as may be necessary to secure an immediate termination of hostilities in Cuba and an independent and stable government by the people thereof, and to enable him to carry out the purposes of this resolution he is hereby empowered and directed to use the land and naval forces of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. HALE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 147) providing for the organization and enrollment of the United States auxiliary naval force for coast defense; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PROCTOR introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 148) providing for the printing of House Document 396, for the use of the Department of Agriculture; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Printing.

RELIEF OF DESTITUTE PERSONS FROM CUBA.

Mr. PASCO. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be read at length; and when it has been read, I shall ask that it be considered.

The joint resolution (S. R. 143) authorizing the use of a part of the appropriation heretofore made for the relief of the destitute citizens of the United States in the Island of Cuba for the aid of such citizens, refugees, and others who have reached our shores was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to expend, at his discretion, part of the sum remaining of the appropriation for the relief of destitute citizens of the United States in the Island of Cuba, made by public resolution No. 11, approved May 24, 1897, not to exceed the sum of $5,000, for the relief of destitute and needy citizens, refugees, and others who have under recent exigencies left that island and reached our shores.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PASCO. The joint resolution referred to in the pending joint resolution was adopted May 24 of last year. It provided for the relief of destitute American citizens who were then in Cuba. Many of them in consequence of recent events have come over to our shores. I am informed by correspondents and by friends at home that there is a great deal of suffering among them at Tampa, at Key West, at Ocala, and at other points.

The President was only authorized under the joint resolution passed last year to assist those who were in the Island of Cuba. The proposition submitted in this joint resolution is to extend his authority and allow him at his discretion to use a part of the fund, not to exceed the sum of $5,000, for the relief of those who have actually reached our shores and who are in a needy and impoverished condition. Some of them are American citizens. Some of them have announced their intention to become citizens. Others are refugees and are in need of the aid of the Government. The people of Tampa and other cities have helped them to the extent of their ability. They have helped those who have reached different points in Florida, but my information is that the amount of local aid is utterly insufficient to relieve the people who are needy and impoverished.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator state whether the joint resolution proposes to relieve those persons who have come over within the last few days?

Mr. PASCO. They have come over within the last few weeks. Their coming is not limited to any time. The authority is given to the President to use his discretion to aid those who have come over recently and under existing exigencies.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand that a great many have come to this country within the last few days.

Mr. PASCO. A great many have come within the past few days and weeks. The authority is given to extend the helping hand of the Government to those people.

Mr. ALLEN. About how many are in a suffering condition?

Mr. PASCO. I can not tell the Senator from Nebraska the number, but I will read an extract from a letter which was received by Mr. Perry S. Heath, the First Assistant Postmaster-General, upon whom I called yesterday morning, learning that he had received some information which was not at my disposal. This letter is from a very estimable lady who lives at Ocala, Fla. I have not the authority to use her name, but I read from the body of the letter as follows:

The citizens of Tampa have been working like beavers, and all denominations are working shoulder to shoulder—Catholics included. The Cuban bankers gave out hundreds of loaves of bread each day, and soup houses are opened at which 10,000 rations are served weekly at a cost of $450 per week. The mission schools of the Methodist Church South, with over 200 pupils, are assisting all of their patrons, except three, by contributions of food and clothes which our Woman's Parsonage and Home Mission Society have sent from over the State. Children come to school without a mouthful of food, and must be fed before they can be taught.

The needs are being increased by the constant incoming of refugees from Havana. Many families, formerly wealthy, are now entirely dependent. Do you not think this state of affairs should be recognized in the appropriation for aid? There has been some little given by the Junta, but the amount is inadequate to the need.

* * * * * * *

I do not feel that this whole expense should be borne by Florida alone, but that as matters are now I feel it to be a matter of interest to our whole country. Am I right?

I do not suppose this suffering is confined to any particular place, and I propose that the President shall be empowered to use a portion of the fund already in his hands. It requires no reappropriation, but he is to use a portion of the fund in his discretion to aid those people and others in the country who have reached our shores and who need the helping hand of the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Florida if he knows how much of this fund is still in the hands of the authorities of the United States?

Mr. PASCO. I have not been able to get that information, but I was told by a member of the Committee on Appropriations that there is a sufficient amount left to admit of this application of the proposed sum of $5,000. I presume that if a further amount is needed the proper information from official sources will reach the two Houses and that the amount will be added to, if it should become necessary at a later time.

Mr. GALLINGER. One other question. The Senator from Florida will remember that the Senate voted very cordially, and I think unanimously, for the original appropriation of $50,000, but it was to be used to relieve the suffering of American citizens. As I understand the pending joint resolution, it is extended beyond that to include the refugees from another country. Am I correct?

Mr. PASCO. It extends a little further. Many of these persons are refugees, as I have already stated. Some are American citizens. Some of them have declared their intention to become citizens. But it is extended to include refugees who, under similar circumstances, have been compelled to seek our shores.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, one other question. My sympathies are for these people, and I presume that this appropriation will be voted cordially; but I wish to ask the Senator from Florida under whose direction the fund will be distributed? Will it be distributed by the collector of the port or some such official?

Mr. PASCO. It will be distributed under the direction of the President of the United States, to whom the sum of $50,000 was committed.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the United States had consuls at all the ports in Cuba, and the money was expended officially by those representatives of the United States Government. I ask in good faith through what channel this charity will be dispensed in Florida if it is voted?

Mr. PASCO. There has been no suggestion made. In thinking over that matter myself I thought that as the discretion had been formerly given to the President, and we had abundant reason to think that that discretion had been wisely executed, the necessary sums could properly be distributed by the Executive through the Government officers or through such other sources as he may deem best.

Mr. GALLINGER. Or he could send an agent?

Mr. PASCO. He could send an agent there. There has been no restriction placed upon the hand of the President as to how he shall make use of these funds, but entire power and authority has been given to him, with confidence that his discretion will be used wisely and well and for the benefit of these suffering people.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is the Senator reasonably sure that this amount of $5,000 is still unappropriated?

Mr. PASCO. I am reasonably sure that that amount still exists unappropriated. If not, and if further money is needed, I think there will be no trouble in getting it when we are informed that more should be applied to this use.

Mr. HOAR. This is an appropriation for the same object and only extends the power of the President?

Mr. PASCO. It only extends the power of the President.

Mr. HOAR. The preceding joint resolution applied only to the cases of American citizens, and now those who have changed their locality by coming to this country are to be the objects of this bounty.

Mr. PASCO. Practically so, though the power of the President is to be somewhat extended. It is not absolutely confined to those who are American citizens, but extends to American citizens, refugees, and others who have come to our shores under recent exigencies.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. SPOONER submitted an amendment relative to the reimbursement of E. D. Coe for funds stolen from the post-office at Whitewater, Wis., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITE submitted an amendment relative to the payment of the claim of the Union Iron Works for extra work on the Monterey, intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PASCO submitted an amendment relative to the appointment of a board of three officers to determine the desirability of locating and constructing a dry dock at or near Key West, Fla., intended to be proposed to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FINES FOR VIOLATION OF NAVIGATION LAWS.

Mr. ELKINS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate the following information: A statement of the amount of fines on vessels paid into the Treasury for violation of our navigation laws during each year for the last five years, and a statement of the number and amount of fines remitted during the same period for such violations, setting forth upon the recommendation of what persons or owners of vessels such fines were so remitted.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 9th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 771) to incorporate the National Florence Crittenton Mission; and

An act (S. 1116) to pay the heirs of the late John Roach, deceased, $330,151.42 for labor and material, dockage and detention, and occupation of yards and shops for the gunboats Chicago, Boston, and Atlanta.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had, on the 11th instant, approved and signed the following acts and joint resolutions:

An act (S. 1320) granting a pension to Sophia J. Chilcott;

An act (S. 1462) granting an increase of pension to Enoch G. Adams;

An act (S. 1521) granting a pension to Sarah M. Spyker;

An act (S. 1837) granting a pension to Sarah E. Cotton;

An act (S. 3056) authorizing the Shreveport and Red River Valley Railway Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Loggy Bayou, in Louisiana;

A joint resolution (S. R. 28) making an appropriation for the improvement of the Anacostia River and the reclamation of its flats;

A joint resolution (S. R. 105) relative to the appropriation for the Rouge River, Michigan; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 129) relative to suspension of part of section 355 of Revised Statutes, relative to erection of forts, fortifications, and so forth.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. 8972) to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Diocese of Washington;" and

A bill (H. R. 9205) to authorize the extension eastwardly of the Columbia Railway.

DESTRUCTION OF BATTLE SHIP MAINE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

In response to a resolution of the Senate of the 4th instant, I inclose herewith a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, inclosing a copy of a report from the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 12, 1898.

AFFAIRS IN CUBA.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

Mr. MASON. I trust the Senator from Alabama will pardon me a moment, that we may have an understanding. I gave notice that I would address the Senate following the morning business, but I yield to the Senator from Alabama. I shall seek the floor after the Senator has finished. I am perfectly willing to wait. I think there can be no misunderstanding, Mr. President.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, it is declared in the Great Book, "Remove not the ancient landmark." And it is also declared, "Remove not the landmark which thy father hath left." Then the Great Book reaches the climax—"Cursed be he that removeth the landmark which his father hath set: and all the people shall say, Amen." A landmark was at one time and is now a mark upon the ground to show to whom the property belongs. A landmark is also said to be the law of the land by which a man is to be governed, and by which Senates and Houses of Representatives and Presidents of the United States also are to be governed.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate in this critical hour to some of these ancient landmarks. We need to go back in critical times like these and to see the landmarks which our fathers have set.

Mr. President, this is not a monarchy, where the king can use the army and navy to make war or to "intervene" whenever and wherever he desires to do so.

Much has been said of "international law" and of what one nation may or may not do under its provisions. I will not discuss that subject. Senators, I invite your attention to a question of law nearer home, to that law which we are all sworn to support—the Constitution of the United States; that law which gives us all the powers we have, and which gives to the President all the powers he can rightfully exercise.

Before that Constitution created the United States the executive of each nation, with few exceptions, had the power "to declare war." But our Constitution carefully divides the powers of government into the legislative, executive, and judicial. It declares in the first section of the first article:

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

And it further declares:

The Congress shall have power * * * to declare war.—Section 8 of Article I.

The President, though he is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and of the militia when called into service, can not "declare war." Neither can he make war until "the Congress" has declared war. This is so plainly written in the Constitution that no one has or will contradict it. And the Supreme Court of the United States has many times decided that the Congress alone has power to "declare war."

I desire specially that Senators will notice this proposition:

As the Congress has the power "to declare war," it has the power to limit the war which it declares. It can declare war generally against another nation, or it can declare war against a particular part of the people and property of a nation. In other words, the Congress can declare a general or a special war against another nation.

The Supreme Court of the United States has expressly decided, in Talbot vs. The Amelia, 4 Cranch Reports, page 37—

That a war may be limited and at the same time a public war, if declared by Congress.

And the war with France, which the Congress declared about 1809, was in fact a limited war. And the case of Talbot vs. The Amelia, which I have quoted from 4 Cranch, grew out of the recapture of the Amelia, an American vessel, from the French by another American vessel. And the admiralty court held that plaintiffs were entitled, under our statutes, to one-half the value of the Amelia and her cargo as salvage. And the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed that judgment.

That war, declared by Congress, was not against France generally, but it was against the ships of that nation "on the high seas;" and the declaration authorized our Navy and our privateers to make war on or capture the ships or vessels of the French nation, public or private, on the high seas. And our Supreme Court held that the war was limited to a war against the ships of the French nation and people on the high seas, and that the war could not be carried on on land or on any water which was not "the high seas."

So I have proved that the Congress has the power, under our Constitution, to declare a general or a limited war.

But, though the Congress has the power to declare a general or a limited war, it has no authority to delegate that power to the President or to any other officer.

The Congress, if war is to be declared or made, must itself declare it, and must direct how it shall be carried on, either generally or specially. The Congress must order what the war shall be. And it is the duty of the President, as Commander in Chief, to carry on the war as Congress has declared it, and not otherwise.

Look at the authorities, Senators. Judge Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, pages 116 and 117, says:

> One of the settled maxims in constitutional law is that the power conferred upon the legislature to make laws can not be delegated by that department to any other body or authority. Where the sovereign power of the State has located the authority, there it must remain; and by the constitutional agency alone the laws must be made, until the Constitution itself is changed. The power to whose judgment, wisdom, and patriotism this high prerogative has been intrusted can not relieve itself of the responsibility by choosing other agencies upon which the power shall be devolved, nor can it substitute the judgment, wisdom, and patriotism of any other body for those to which alone the people have seen fit to confide this sovereign trust.

And the great writer here cites very many of the decisions of the courts to the same effect.

In Field vs. Clarke, 143 United States Reports, page 692, the Supreme Court says:

> That Congress can not confer legislative power on the President is a principal universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution.

These authorities are conclusive. So war can not be waged at the will of the President until declared by Congress; nor can Congress give him discretion to wage war or not, at his discretion. Congress can not authorize the President to make a new law or to change an old law.

A declaration of war against Spain or against any of the people or property of Spain is the enactment of a new law. It changes existing relations of the greatest concern to all the people of both nations.

1. The two nations are now friends; such declaration makes them enemies.

2. There are many treaty obligations between the two countries; such declaration repeals all of them.

3. The people of Spain can now lawfully trade with the people of our country; after such declaration such trading would be a crime and the trades would be void.

4. The willful destruction of a Spanish man-of-war by one of our officers would now be a felony; after such declaration it would be simply a discharge of duty.

And so hundreds of changes in the law could be named, the direct effect of such declaration.

Now, Senators, what are we advised to do?

To declare war? No.

To recognize the Cuban Republic as an independent nation? No.

To recognize the Cubans as belligerents? No.

What are we advised to do? If you will boil the words down to their true meaning, we are advised to delegate to the President the power to intervene between Spain and Cuba for the purpose of putting an end to the war, and to use the Army and Navy at his discretion and force both parties to keep the peace; or, in other words, we are advised to give the President power to intervene and make war, if he sees fit, without declaring war at all.

We are to abandon to the President "this sovereign trust," as Judge Cooley calls this authority given by the people only to the Congress. For one, I will not do it.

Mr. President, war made on our part not strictly defensive, without a declaration of war, would disgrace the nation. We have no power to do it. For God's sake, let us keep inside our constitutional powers; let us not either ourselves violate that sacred instrument or tolerate its violation by another. You have no power yourselves to delegate such awful responsibility to any other officer of this Government; it belongs to you and to the other branch of this great Legislature. You must take the responsibility. If war is to be made, you must not only declare it yourselves generally, but if you make special war, then you must direct how it shall be carried on. You can not turn the President loose on a nation to make war when and as he pleases. You must declare how war shall be made if it is not to be a general war, and you must declare when it is to be made if it is a general war.

Mr. President, the policy of the United States, as shown in its history and in the teachings of its great statesmen, has been, and ought forever to be, to concede to every other nation the full measure of its just rights, to the weak as well as to the strong, and to require of every other nation, of the strong as well as the weak, the full measure of the just rights of the United States. This has been a most glorious policy! It is founded on the "Rock of Ages." It makes patriots of the whole people. It makes heroes of the entire Army and Navy. So long as that policy is faithfully carried out every man in the United States is justly proud to be named "an American citizen."

He glories in the flag of his country because it represents a Government just to others, and he glories in the flag of his country still more (for such is human nature) because it represents a Government ready and able to enforce its own rights and to protect its own citizens. St. Paul claimed to be "a Roman citizen;" and the British flag now protects the subjects of that great Empire from wrongs threatened by other powers on land or on sea in every part of the known world. England may oppress some of its own subjects, but no other power is allowed to wrong any one of them. This glorious policy, to do justice and to require that justice shall be done to our own Government and people, so long as it continues to be our governing principle, will make our country a nation for which every true man will be ready and willing to live, to work, or to die.

This was the grand policy of our country. God, in His mercy, grant that we do not abandon it for the sickening circumlocution of diplomatic negotiations.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. VEST. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7445) to amend "An act authorizing the construction of a railway, street railway, motor, wagon, and pedestrian bridge over the Missouri River, near Council Bluffs, Iowa, and Omaha, Nebr.," and to extend the time for the completion of the bridge therein provided for, to report it favorably.

As the same bill has been reported by the same committee to the Senate as a Senate bill, I ask that Senate bill 3654, which is on the Calendar as Order of Business 757, may be indefinitely postponed, and that the bill which I have just reported may take its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That substitution will be made, in the absence of objection.

Mr. ALLEN. What is to take the place of that bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The House bill which has been reported by the Senator from Missouri is to be substituted for the Senate bill, and he asks that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. VEST. The two bills are identical.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator refer to the bill which passed the House a day or two ago?

Mr. VEST. This bill has passed the House, and this is the House bill which it is proposed to substitute for the Senate bill.

Mr. ALLEN. That is all right, but I should like to have the House bill put on its passage at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the indefinite postponement of Senate bill 3654, which is Order of Business 757 on the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] will be kind enough to yield for just a moment for the consideration of the House bill, it will not lead to any debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ALLEN. It is a mere formal bill, which will pass, I think, without any objection whatever, and it is very important that it should pass.

Mr. MASON. I prefer to proceed with my remarks, and hope the Senator will excuse me unless it is a matter connected with the subject which has been under discussion and in which we are all interested; at least, I am very much interested in it.

Mr. ALLEN. I did not know but in view of the fact that hostilities will not begin to-day that possibly we might put that bill on its passage.

Mr. MASON. The Senator does not know that. I have not been heard from yet. [Laughter.]

AFFAIRS IN CUBA.

[Mr. MASON addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I do not desire to enter into a discussion of the Cuban situation and the President's message to-day. I prefer to wait until to-morrow, when the Committee on Foreign Relations, it is to be hoped, will bring in its report; but it is probably well that we should have some sort of an understanding now.

I belong to what is called the opposition on this floor. So far we have stood by the President and upheld his hands as loyally as any Republican on the floor or as any member of his Cabinet. When he asked for $50,000,000 to defend the national honor, there were none in Congress who voted that appropriation more heartily and joined more fully in expressing unlimited confidence, approval, and support of the President than did the Populists, Silver Republicans, and Democrats.

Mr. President, I for one cast that vote with as much pleasure as any that I ever cast. I am ready to continue to uphold the hands of this Administration as long as I can do so and represent the sentiments of my people and respect myself. But inasmuch as the President of the United States has not upheld the national honor and has sent in a message which can not have the approval, I am sorry to say, of the People's Party, and which has not the united support of his own party, I rise to say that I sincerely trust that the Committee on Foreign Relations, in an hour like this, when our national honor is at stake and when humanity and liberty are hanging in the balance, may be able to bring in a resolution that we can stand and vote for unitedly and unanimously as we did upon the appropriation of $50,000,000 to be placed in the President's hands to vindicate and defend the national honor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The Senator from North Carolina will suspend for a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2680) amending an act granting additional quarantine powers and imposing additional duties upon the Marine-Hospital Service, approved February 15, 1893.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside, so that the Senator from North Carolina may conclude his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The unfinished business will be informally laid aside, and the Senator from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I have heard it intimated that there were some members of the opposition, probably referring to either Democrats, Silver Republicans, or Populists, who might find some pleasure and some political satisfaction if the Administration should fail to measure up to what American manhood and patriotism and national honor demand. I do not believe that there is any such sentiment harbored by any man on this floor or in the other branch of Congress who belongs to the opposition.

I for one repudiate such a suggestion. If there is anyone, though, who for political advantage could for a moment take pleasure in seeing the Administration take such a course as would bring humiliation upon our nation, such a course as would be condemned at the polls by an indignant and outraged American people, then I have no more respect for that person than I have for the stock jobbers and bond shylocks who like vultures have been hanging around the White House and who are trying to put their fingers into this grave situation and make merchandise out of the bones of our murdered sailors and the tarnished honor of the nation.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] entertained and instructed us by quoting some most important precedents. But, Mr. President, we are dealing with a situation that is unprecedented. The history of the world so far has not been blackened by a crime that parallels the crime of February 15 in Havana Harbor. It was an unparalleled crime in blackness, villainy, and treachery. Every civilized nation and all Christian people would be bound to uphold our hands and approve our conduct if we were to use our Army and Navy to drive every Spanish vessel from the sea and lay waste her towns and cities to avenge that most foul crime.

We have a chance, however, to force atonement for that crime on a plane higher than justifiable revenge. We have an opportunity to avenge it in the interest of humanity and liberty. If there were no Cuba, if Weyler and the cruel Spanish soldiers had never desecrated and polluted the soil of that unhappy island, this country could not face the world and maintain its self-respect without avenging such a crime as the destruction of the Maine and the murder of our sailors. Yet here we have a message from our Chief Executive, whom we would all like to follow and support if he had the courage to lead, who refers to this most dastardly and infamous crime against our nation as a trifling incident, who makes no recommendation about it, but suggests that Spain has suggested that we might be able to arbitrate it at some time in the future. It is sickening; it is humiliating!

Mr. President, I am for avenging the Maine, and I would be for avenging it if Cuba did not enter into the question. But Cuba is a fellow-sufferer with us. She is being ravished and pillaged by the same devilish cruelty and treachery that blew up the Maine and murdered our sailors; therefore let us rise to the plane that the people of the world should expect a great republic to rise to on such an occasion, and not avenge the Maine by conquest, not by demanding indemnity or laying waste her towns and cities for revenge, but let us in a dignified way, though in language that can not be misunderstood, say to her and to the world that she must take at once her troops and her flag from Cuban soil; that we will establish a Cuban republic as a monument to our dead sailors; that we will accept that as an atonement for the crime, and nothing less; and if Spain will not accept it peaceably, then let us make it good with our Army and the Navy, and every patriot in the world will applaud. Does this message suggest that we take such a noble and patriotic course? No.

Mr. President, every man with whom I speak on the subject understands this message differently. Unfortunately nobody knows, it seems, what the President means. If I can understand the message, it means that the President is opposed to Cuban independence now or hereafter. He does not even ask us to empower him to intervene that we may establish independence. He carefully uses the language "to establish a stable government." I regret that the President did not say what he meant, for it would have given me the greatest pleasure to have voted for his recommendation, if it had been an honorable one. As it is, I do not know. It may mean that he wants us to vote to authorize him to establish a Spanish dependency, to keep the Spanish flag over the island, and give them a government but very little better than the one they have had so far.

It may mean that he wants me to vote to give him power to establish a monarchy, a dependency of this country, or that he may lease the island out to a syndicate of capitalists and bond sharks. Mr. President, I do not know what he means, but when I vote I shall know what I vote for.

The President asks us further to give him power and authority "to intervene" to "stop war in the island." I know what that means, because we have been informed already that he asked Spain to stop fighting, and she stopped temporarily. Now he asks us to empower him to intervene to stop war. There is nobody now who wants to fight, it seems, but the Cuban patriots, who are fighting for their liberty. Shall I vote to authorize him to stop the Cubans? Shall I vote to authorize him to make war against Gomez and his patriotic followers? I do not know what others will do, but for me, never. Such a proposition ought to make every American blush with shame. To "stop war in the island" without independence for Cuba means to become an ally of perfidious Spain to crush the Cuban patriots and nothing else. What does such an outrageous proposition mean?

The Senator from Illinois this morning, in argument unanswerable, showed that if we honestly favor Cuban independence and do not want to be a party to mortgaging the island to a greedy syndicate of bondholders, the only wise and manly course, the only safe, patriotic course, is first to recognize independence before we intervene. I would like for some person who favors intervention without recognition to give one single, solitary reason for it. If there is any reason, we ought to know it. It has been stated by some of the best lawyers in Congress and in the country that to intervene without first recognizing the independence of the Cuban Republic would make us liable for the Spanish bonds. Certainly that is a doubtful question, if it is not absolutely true. Then pray tell me why we shall take the risk. Give us one reason for doing such a doubtful and foolish thing. There is some dark and secret purpose behind such a monstrous proposition.

Mr. President, I do not like to predict unless I can make pleasant predictions, but I am impelled to make the prediction that if this Government passes a resolution authorizing intervention at the discretion of the President without first recognizing the unqualified independence of the Cuban Republic, either the Cuban Republic will never be recognized and never become a free nation, or else before it is done a mortgage will be placed upon that island and upon its future generation that will make the Cuban patriots more helpless and pitiable than the Egyptian slaves under the lash of the English taskmaster, a mortgage to put millions of profit into the pockets of the same bond syndicate that has been bleeding this country and that is to-day controlling the destinies of Europe. Is it possible that this syndicate's siren song has caught the ear of the Administration? Will Congress surrender to its devilish influence? This syndicate must be grappled with and defeated by Congress before the Maine can be avenged and before Cuba can be free.

Mr. President, a number of us are often ridiculed when we speak of this shylock syndicate and its baleful intermeddling in the affairs of nations. I hold in my hand a copy of the Review of Reviews, a magazine that has never been accused of "silver heresy" or of any other lunacy that is usually charged against American patriots, the followers of Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln, but yet it contains a statement of facts, a statement that was made two months ago, that has been copied in hundreds of newspapers and republished in other magazines from one end of the country to the other and in many foreign magazines and journals, and no one has attempted to contradict it or refute it. It is a statement of certain recent operations of this gigantic international bond syndicate.

Let us have the description read here, and see if that same syndicate may not be intermeddling now to prevent Cuban independence. I ask the Secretary to read the two paragraphs marked. It is a part of the comments of the editor of the Review of Reviews upon the Chinese loan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The financial plan by which it is proposed that England should lend China a great sum of money is interesting on several accounts. The money of course will be supplied primarily by the great international banking houses of Europe, which will take up a new issue of British consols at the ruling low rate of interest, presumably 2½ per cent. England will take the proceeds of this issue of consols and turn the amount over to China at, say, 4 per cent.

With Chinese sources of revenue under the control of English officials like Sir Robert Hart, the regular payment of interest and of installments on the loan will be reasonably certain, and the profit accruing to the British Government from the difference in the rate of interest would in any case form a sinking fund which in the course of a reasonable term of years would pay off the consols and leave the Chinese loan a matter of clear profit. The matter has peculiar interest from the fact that the arrangement is supposed to have been worked out chiefly by the great bankers, who are neither English, French, nor German in their real allegiance, but must be regarded as a law unto themselves and a separate power, gradually but steadily strengthening their grasp upon the destiny of nations.

It was this huge, mysterious money power that enabled the continental governments, led by Russia, to circumvent England and place the Chinese loan at the close of the Japanese war. And now it is the same hidden but potent force that declines to allow the continental powers to make the present Chinese loan, but ordains that England shall make it. The issues of the recent Turco-Greek war were decided, unquestionably, by this coalition of European bankers, who improved the opportunity to gain a better hold upon the revenues both of Turkey and of Greece, and cleared up millions of profit out of the hideous conflict between Moslem and Christian.

Their influence has slaughtered the Armenians and wrought the discomfiture of Greece. The hand of this coalition of European bankers has been constantly felt in the affairs of Spain and Cuba. Their method is to secure control of great issues of public securities at heavy discounts, bearing high rates of interest, and then so to manipulate diplomacy and the course of international politics as ultimately to make certain the payment in full of interest and principal. It is not pleasant to remember that these foreign gentlemen, with their finger in every diplomatic and international affair, were invited to come to the rescue of the United States Treasury under the last Administration.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, there is a cold, bald, straightforward statement of facts, which if true—and there is no reason to doubt the truth of it—is enough to make us hesitate. It is enough to at least require an explanation of why we are called upon to take such a course as would make it possible, if not certain, for this bond syndicate to fatten upon the miseries of Cuba. To declare the independence of the Cuban Republic would force these cold-blooded and heartless money changers to take their fingers out of the question; to recognize the independence of the present Cuban Government will make it impossible for a settlement to be made after intervention by which the liberty of the patriots could be bartered for sordid gold.

If you fail to declare the independence of the island, all of this is possible. There may be some other explanation as to why we are asked not to recognize the independence of the island, but to authorize the President to intervene at his discretion. If there is any other, I hope to hear it. The manipulations of this bond syndicate will certainly stand as a reason unless a better one can be given.

The President has not dealt frankly with Congress and the country. His strange course has justified these conclusions.

Mr. President, why is General Lee coming home? We were told that he had to get out of Cuba before this message was read. We were told the message would be so scathing of Spanish treachery and crime, so charged with genuine American patriotism, so strong and firm for Cuban independence, that war would immediately follow, and that General Lee's life would be in jeopardy if he remained in Cuba. But here is the message—it is in the interest of Spain and not in the interest of Cuba; a message in the interest of the bondholders and not in the interest of liberty; a message that causes rejoicing among the bond dealers and stock gamblers in Wall street; a message that causes every Spanish fiend and devil who has been persecuting Cuba and dishonoring our flag to build bonfires and rejoice.

Necessary for the message to be held back for General Lee to get out of Cuba! I do not know but one set of people in the world who would disturb General Lee in Cuba if he had stayed there and said that he was in favor of the policy set out in that message, and it is not the cruel Spaniards. Probably he was taken out of Cuba to protect him from the insurgents. I do not know anybody else who would have interfered with him if he had indorsed the message.

I had not opened my mouth before yesterday during the whole time this Cuban question has been discussed. I have sat in my seat because there were others who could present the situation and express my sentiments much better than I can express them myself. I have sat day after day and heard eloquent speeches and learned arguments that gave me pleasure and profit. I felt that it was unnecessary for me to speak and express my opinion; but, Mr. President, the time has come when within a few hours I hope we shall be called upon to vote on a definite proposition.

The last one I voted on I voted with pleasure, and felt proud that I was an American citizen. I voted to put $50,000,000 in the hands of the President to defend our national honor. It has not been defended. The President has proven himself incompetent to deal with the situation as liberty, humanity, and national honor demand. The responsibility is now on Congress. We must remove the humiliation that is upon us as a nation. And we will do it if the bond syndicate does not capture us.

Mr. President, I am ready to vote $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 more, if necessary, to avenge the Maine and to free Cuba, but I am not ready to vote one dollar more or to vote to sustain a policy one step further that does not look to avenging the Maine and freeing Cuba. I shall not vote for any policy which is doubtful, double-faced; I shall not vote for any policy which leaves it open for this Spanish bond deal to be put through to disgrace our country and to enslave Cuba. I shall not vote for a proposition which treats the Maine outrage and tragedy as "an incident" and calls upon us to submit to arbitrating our national honor and the lives of our citizens murdered in the dark by treacherous and perfidious enemies.

I speak to-day so that no one may misunderstand me when I speak upon or vote upon the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I want to say that I believe I represent every Populist and Silver Republican and Democrat in this sentiment, that if a proposition is brought before the Senate that means the independence of the Cuban Republic and the wiping from our flag of the stain that was put on it in Havana Harbor, it will get the united and enthusiastic and hearty support of every member on this floor and in the other House; and I hope I express the sentiment of every one when I say that if a different proposition comes, such as the Shylocks are working for, it will not get a single one of our votes, and it ought not to.

Mr. President, the Maine must be avenged and Cuba must be free!

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7445) to amend "An act authorizing the construction of a railway, street railway, motor, wagon, and pedestrian bridge over the Missouri River, near Council Bluffs, Iowa, and Omaha, Nebr.," and to extend the time for the completion of the bridge therein provided for, which was favorably reported this morning by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] from the Committee on Commerce and was substituted on the Calendar in place of Senate bill 3654, which is exactly similar.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senate now to proceed with the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me, I should like unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will first put the request of the Senator from Iowa that unanimous consent be given for the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CARTER. I now ask the Senator from Iowa to yield to me in order that I may ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill which I think will not lead to any debate.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield for that purpose.

JOSEPH TOUSAINT.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3684) for the relief of Joseph Tousaint, alias Touzin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the sundry civil appropriation bill may be informally laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, in line 8, after the word "hereby," to strike out "authorize to sue and be sued and to recover any and all property and rights of property to which he would have been, or would be, entitled if he had been fully naturalized under the laws of the United States," and to insert "authorized to prosecute Indian depredation claim No. 8699, now pending in the United States Court of Claims, and to receive judgment therein, the same as if he had been naturalized under the laws of the United States at the date of the loss;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That Joseph Tousaint, alias Touzin, having served as a teamster with the United States Army during the war of the rebellion and with the Regular Army before the late war, be, and he is hereby, relieved from any disability under the laws of the United States Army from any defect of naturalization, and is hereby authorized to prosecute Indian depredation claim No. 8899, now pending in the United States Court of Claims, and to receive judgment therein the same as if he had been naturalized under the laws of the United States at the date of the loss.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8428) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I inquire if there is a question now pending on any amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. There is a question pending on the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. SHOUP]. I do not see him in the Chamber.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I wish to offer an amendment at this period.

Mr. ALLISON. The amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho is not objected to by the committee, and therefore it may be agreed to now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the pending amendment submitted by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. SHOUP.]

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, after line 11, on page 69, the following:

Maps of public-land States: For the publication of maps of public-land States, to be distributed under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I propose an amendment which I send to the desk. I supposed it had been agreed to by the Committee on Appropriations. I was before the committee and understood that it had been agreed to. I think it must have been omitted from the bill by mistake.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 101, after line 19, it is proposed to insert:

The provision in the river and harbor act of June 3, 1896, authorizing the expenditure of $10,000 upon Yellow Mill Pond, so called, in Bridgeport Harbor, conditioned upon the construction by the city of Bridgeport of a drawbridge upon plans approved by the Secretary of War, is hereby so amended as to permit the immediate expenditure of said sum in the discretion of the Secretary of War, the plans for said bridge having been approved by him and the sum of $20,000 appropriated therefor by the city of Bridgeport.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think the amendment is not objected to by the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand, this is an amendment which merely provides for the manner of expending an appropriation heretofore made, and it is recommended by the Secretary of War.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The amendment does not involve any new appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WELLINGTON in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I offer an amendment to be inserted on page 105, line 12, after the word "dollars."

The amendment was read and agreed to, as follows:

Provided, That $25,000 of said sum shall be used under the direction of the Secretary of War for the purpose of constructing a high bridge across Rock River on the line of said canal, in lieu of the one known as the Moline Bridge, in the county of Rock Island.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 12, on page 27, after the word "retired," it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That no portion of the sum authorized to be used for plate printing shall be used for any printing of notes, bonds, checks, or internal-revenue stamps other than for printing from hand-roller presses.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this is a matter which a large number of Senators have spoken to me about and said that they desired to be here to vote upon. If the amendment is to be contested, I shall feel under obligations to ask that a call of the Senate be made. I should like to know from the chairman of the committee, first, whether it is to be opposed by the committee?

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations considered this subject, and they refused to insert the amendment in the appropriation bill. I think it is unwise to insert it in this bill, and I believe that is the opinion at least of a majority of the committee, if not of the entire committee. Therefore, in that sense it will be contested. Of course I shall be glad to hear from Senators who think that what is proposed by the amendment ought to be done, but I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will waive the amendment for the time being, so that some amendments may be considered which will probably not be objected to, though to whatever course he desires to pursue I shall not object.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have been holding this amendment for a couple of days; in fact for a longer time than that. Senators have been inquiring about it, and saying to me that they would be glad to have it offered when they could be present. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen,	Gorman,	Martin,	Spooner,
Allison,	Hale,	Mills,	Thurston,
Bate,	Hansbrough,	Money,	Tillman,
Berry,	Harris,	Morrill,	Turley,
Cannon,	Hawley,	Pasco,	Turner,
Carter,	Heitfeld,	Penrose,	Turpie,
Chandler,	Jones, Nev.	Perkins,	Warren,
Chilton,	Kyle,	Pettigrew,	Wellington,
Cockrell,	Lindsay,	Pettus,	Wetmore,
Cullom,	Lodge,	Platt, Conn.	White,
Daniel,	McBride,	Pritchard,	Wilson,
Deboe,	McEnery,	Quay,	Wolcott.
Fairbanks,	McLaurin,	Roach,
Frye,	McMillan,	Sewell,
Gallinger,	Mallory,	Shoup,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum is present. The pending question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in advocacy of the amendment I have proposed, which I regret is antagonized by any Senator, I wish to occupy the attention of the Senate for a very brief time.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If the Senator does not object, I should like to have the amendment again read, as it is short.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire will be again read.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this is not a new question for the Congress of the United States. It has been fought over once or twice before, and some of us at least supposed that it had been definitely and permanently settled, but it seems that that is not the fact. I remember that in the Fiftieth Congress, of which I chanced to be a member, lengthy hearings were had before the House Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, when the whole subject of steam and hand-roller presses had very careful consideration. The use of steam presses was reported against in that Congress, and a bill passed the House of Representatives by an overwhelming majority condemning the use of steam presses for the purpose of printing the money that is to circulate among the people of this great country.

In the second session of that Congress legislation was placed on the sundry civil act which has stood ever since, and which has kept steam presses out of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator read that provision?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not think I have it at hand.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Iowa asks me to read the legislation to which I have referred. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that I do not contend that this is affirmative legislation denying the right to use steam presses in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. What I did say was that it was legislation which drove from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing steam presses, and from that time to the present they have not been used. There were restrictions in this legislation which compelled their abandonment, as the Senator will remember.

This legislation was made after three committees of the Fiftieth Congress had exhaustively investigated the merits and safety of employing steam presses instead of hand-roller presses, and both Houses almost unanimously declared for the discarding of the steam presses, which instructions the Treasury Department carried out immediately.

Ten years have elapsed since Congress prohibited, practically, the use of steam presses on bank notes, checks, bonds, internal-revenue stamps, etc., and now at the end of ten years it is proposed by an official of the Government to install steam presses once more in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the purpose of printing bank notes, checks, etc., in which I say the people of this country are greatly interested.

In the Forty-third Congress the question of printing Government notes and securities was very fully considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House, and I wish to read two extracts from the report made by that committee:

All these circumstances—

Says that great committee—

have satisfied the committee that methods of printing, numbering, sealing, and issuing of the securities of the United States ought to be adopted which will approach the nearest to being absolutely secure against error and fraud, even if such methods should be much more expensive than others having less guaranties of protection.

I will read the additional suggestion made by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives in the Fifty-third Congress:

But the committee can not agree that the mere question of economy in printing the obligations and securities of the Government merits consideration in this connection. In their opinion there is but one point in issue in considering this bill, and that is the duty of the Government to afford the citizen the greatest attainable security against counterfeit notes; and being satisfied that this security can be obtained in greater degree by using the hand-roller press exclusively, they are unanimously of the opinion that the steam presses should be discarded.

The report made was a very elaborate one, and contains a great deal of matter which would be extremely interesting in this discussion if I had time to read it; but I will not do so. I will simply say that the committee argues along these two lines: First, that it is not economical to print money in cheap form, money that can readily be counterfeited, and again, that it is a matter of the largest economy for the Government to spend a sufficient amount of money to print its notes in the best possible manner and in a way which makes it the most difficult for counterfeiters to ply their art at the expense of the people who chance to hold notes issued by the Government.

The committee say:

"Labor-saving devices" are not resorted to primarily with a view to save labor, but to reduce the cost of the article upon which labor is engaged, and printing the paper money for a large and active population is not a subject in connection with which the question of cost can properly be considered.

Admit that it may, will, cost one-fourth, one-third, or even one-half more to print a note which can not be counterfeited than it will to print one which offers few difficulties to the nefarious skill of the manufacturer of spurious money, and who will maintain that the saving of the additional cost is true economy?

One single successful counterfeit may easily cost the people many times the amount that has been saved in printing the inferior note, and where all the work is inferior the possibilities of loss to the people are multiplied indefinitely.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SEWELL. I understood the Senator from New Hampshire to say that hand work is the best work that can be made.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do, most assuredly. It has been found——

Mr. SEWELL. I take issue——

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will permit me to complete my answer. I do, most assuredly. It has been so found by every committee of Congress which has ever investigated the subject. It is the opinion, I think, of almost every expert, whether he is a private citizen or an employee of the Government, as I will show the Senator before I get through, if he will be patient.

Mr. SEWELL. The Senator makes the statement.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do. Does the Senator——

Mr. SEWELL. I see nothing in it except the walking delegate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well; the Senator is entitled to his opinion, and he can settle with the walking delegate. I am not speaking either for the Senator or the walking delegate to-day.

In the Fiftieth Congress the subject of inquiry which was presented to the House of Representatives was as to whether or not the securities, bonds, notes, internal-revenue stamps should be printed in the highest style of the art of plate printing upon hand-roller presses. The committee, and they were, I think, as well qualified to judge as the Senator from New Jersey, who seems to settle this question off hand, reached conclusions and Congress accepted those conclusions, and Congress has been bound by those conclusions ever since. For instance, it reached this conclusion:

But the committee can not agree that the mere question of economy in printing the obligations and securities of the Government merits consideration in this connection.

I read that a moment ago, and I desire to read it again:

In their opinion there is but one point in issue in considering this bill, and that is the duty of the Government to afford the citizen the greatest attainable security against counterfeit notes; and being satisfied that this security can be obtained in greater degree by using the hand-roller press exclusively, they are unanimously of the opinion that the steam presses should be discarded.

Mr. President, that great committee did not reach this conclusion without consideration. They had before them expert testimony. They called upon men who served the Government as well as those who were private citizens to give testimony on this point, and their conclusion was reached after the most careful and conscientious consideration.

I have here a memorial from the Plate Printers' Union, No. 7025, to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate, and I ask that it may be printed as a part of my remarks. The Senator from New Jersey may call the gentlemen walking delegates. I prefer to call them honest citizens of a Government that wants to deal fairly with all its people.

MEMORIAL ON BEHALF OF PLATE PRINTERS' UNION, NO. 7025, AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

We respectfully ask the adoption of the following amendment to the pending sundry civil appropriation bill:

"Provided, That no portion of the sum authorized to be used for plate printing shall be used for any printing of notes, bonds, checks, or internal-revenue stamps, other than for printing from hand-roller presses."

We beg to say that the director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is now proposing to install steam plate-printing presses in the Bureau, and the above amendment is absolutely necessary to prevent such action.

The advisability of such installation was reviewed by several committees of the Fiftieth Congress, and such action was taken as at that time prevented this attack upon the integrity of our currency. The attack is now renewed, and should, as before, be repelled by Congress.

It is not at this moment possible to review all the reasons for the adoption of the proviso above given, had we desire to emphasize the fact that plate-printing by steam is an inferior process, and by its peculiarities facilitates the work of the counterfeiter. In the investigations above referred to, absolutely every witness recognized the inferiority of the steam press and many showed the manner in which the steam press rendered counterfeiting easy.

We desire in this connection to submit a few extracts from the record of the former hearings, and also an article recently published in a local paper and respectfully urge in conclusion the adoption of the foregoing proviso.

PLATE PRINTERS' UNION, NO. 7025,
(American Federation of Labor.)

Extracts from testimony—Report on plate printing—Senate Report No. 2004, Fiftieth Congress, second session.

Arthur Small, working steam press:

"I can do much better work on a hand-press." (Page 18.)

Thomas H. Little, formerly steam pressman:

"It [the steam press] will not do as good work as can be done on the hand press." (Page 25.)

Williford E. Nott, formerly steam pressman, testified to steam-press inferiority to the hand work.

John F. Conway, formerly steam pressman:

"My opinion is that you can not produce steam work equal to hand. (Page 33.) I never could produce steam work equal to my hand work. That is impossible." (Page 34.)

Jacob Huck, plate printer:

"I can not do justice toward the face work when done by steam as well as I can when done by hand." (Page 38.)

David Russell, transferrer and engraver:

"The hand-press work is far in advance of the steam-press work; that is, when the hand printing is done properly. If we are going to make a comparison between the best steam-press printing and the poorest hand-press printing there might not be any difference." (Page 41.)

J. W. Osborne, photomechanical expert, on page 60, shows that machine wiping lacks intelligent discrimination of hand worker.

Mary Burke, examiner:

"Q. (By Senator HARRIS.) You have been told to throw out hand-press work that was equally as good as steam-press work that you directed to pass?

"A. Yes, sir." (Page 62.)

And again:

"A. On several occasions I have been told to pass work for the steam press, whereupon I have been told on the hand press to throw the same kind of work out."

Julia Barry, examiner (page 71):

"Q. So that in practice you require the hand-press work to be better than you require the steam-press work to be?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. In what particular do you think the hand-press work is the best?

"A. It has more color and a clearer look; more body to it, to me."

Alice Cruit, a press-room employee who had been engaged on both hand and steam work (page 85):

"Q. From your experience in that way can you state to the committee which press does the better work?

"A. The hand press.

* * * * * * * *

"Q. State to the committee whether, from your experience with the work done by the printers for whom you work as to being accepted or rejected, hand-press work which was done no better than the steam-press work which they accepted would have been accepted from the hand press.

"A. No, sir; they would not accept it from the hand press.

"Q. Have you ever called Mr. Morgan's attention to the condition of the steam work, for instance?

"A. I have often spoken to him. He would say, 'Well, Alice, you can't expect this work to look as good as the hand-press work.'"

Edward Shaffer, a transferrer (page 86):

"Q. Does the printing of the plates by a hand-press printer call for the exercise of judgment and intelligence?

"A. I can answer that question better in this way: The most intelligent man will be the most excellent printer. I have found that in the trade. I have been in the business for thirty years, and I have always found that the smartest man in every way is always the smartest printer, and that man that pays the most attention is the man that does the best brain work.

"Q. In what way does he apply his brains and skill to printing?

"A. In his judgment as to wiping the plate; the different parts of it.

* * * * * * * *

"Q. Is there any work in the Bureau that can be done equally as well by steam as by hand?

"A. No, sir.

* * * * * * * *

Mr. Russell, engraver and transferrer (page 41):

"Q. State which work is the better done, the steam-press work or the hand-press work?

"A. The hand-press work is far in advance of the steam-press work; that is, where the hand printing is done properly. If we are going to make a comparison between the best steam-press printing and the poorest hand-press printing there might not be any difference. The circumstances of the case would alter the result very much.

"Q. Can the finest quality of engraving be printed by a steam press?

"A. Oh, no, sir. I do not think that Mr. Graves or anybody else will claim that a steam printing press will pull a proof of a fine vignette. I don't think anybody will assume that can be done.

"Q. Have you reasons for that?

"A. A good proof impression or a first-class impression off of any engraved work needs to be wiped with a great deal of intelligence to get a perfect impression.

* * * * * * *

"Q. How would it be with a steam press as to wiping in the direction of the lines?

"A. I think it would be impossible to conform to all the requirements of wiping a plate properly with steam machinery, as it must necessarily be mechanical.

"Q. Then intelligence is a necessary ingredient?

"A. Undoubtedly, in the best work."

Mr. Osborne, photo-mechanical expert (page 46):

"Q. Will you please give these notes an examination, with a view of determining which one of the two could most easily and most successfully be reproduced by photo-lithography and its allied sciences?

"A. There is no doubt that the note marked A (the steam-press note) is the easier to counterfeit photographically.

"Q. What are the reasons for that?

"A. Broadly, the reasons are that the work on the other note is better as a printed work of art than on A. The note marked B (the hand-press note) is better work in every respect, but especially as a printed document. The lighter note, A, is a flatter impression than the note marked B. The lighter note is easier to counterfeit, chiefly and essentially for the reason that it is flatter. The difficulty that we meet with in counterfeiting or in copying any engraving printed from an intaglio plate is largely due to the relief which the impression has.

* * * * * * *

"Q. Then reproduction of A would be more deceptive to the general public, aside from the greater facility for reproducing?

"A. I think so. I may safely say that.

"Senator HISCOCK. He covered that point very nicely when he described it before."

Mr. Morgan, superintendent of the Bureau and witness for the steam press, looking at back of note shown him by Mr. Graves, "If I am not mistaken, it seems to me that this back has been printed by a steam press; I may be mistaken."

And again:

"The WITNESS. I would like to make a remark, if I may be allowed to do it, and that is that these specimens of steam backs are the worst specimens that I have ever seen of steam backs.

"Mr. JORDAN. They are taken from circulation."

John P. Swann, superintendent of steam press room:

"Q. You say they are either steam-press backs or blanket impressions?

"A. No, sir; I didn't say that. I said I thought they were steam-press backs, but they might be blanket impressions.

"Q. A blanket impression is a defective impression, is it not?

"A. Yes, sir; it is defective in color.

"Q. It is such an impression as ought not to be allowed to go out of the Bureau?

"A. That is a question that I am not qualified to answer.

"Q. It is, at any rate, defective?

"A. Yes, sir."

* * * * * * * *

John E. Breitmayer, plate printer, on page 346, testified:

"Q. You have had opportunities of comparing the relative excellence of steam and hand press printing?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Give the committee your best judgment on the matter as to which is the more excellent.

"A. I say by all means the hand press; not because I am personally interested."

E. O. Graves, former Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing:

"As to the comparative merits of steam printing and hand printing, it may be said that, speaking in the widest sense, steam printing is not equal to hand printing."

This memorial gives a large number of extracts from the testimony given before that committee on this very question, in which it seemed to be the unanimous conclusion that hand presses did better work and minimized the possibility of counterfeiting our notes, and that it was in the line of true economy for the Government to print its notes and securities on hand presses rather than on steam presses.

Mr. Graves, who is not a walking delegate, who was Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing at one time, and who, I think, for some reason or other at one time advocated the use of steam presses, when he was put upon the stand and asked as to the comparative merits between hand presses and steam presses, gave this testimony:

As to the comparative merits of steam printing and hand printing it may be said that, speaking in the widest sense, steam printing is not equal to hand printing.

That is the opinion of an expert, of a man who has been in the employ of the Government, of a man who has had a responsibility, in whose hands this great question of the character and quality of our currency is not a theory, but a matter of practical, every-day concern.

Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, I am not going to argue this matter at length. I was in one contest when it was considered and when it was argued at great length; and when these conclusions which I have read were reached by a unanimous vote of a committee, and of at least one branch of the National Legislature, I assert that if our money is printed on steam presses, there will be an incalculable loss to the people of this country through counterfeiting, which will be a much easier matter if it is printed on steam presses than it possibly can be when printed on hand presses.

Mr. President, I chance to have a little money here. [Exhibiting.] It is not my own. I borrowed it for this purpose. I want to give very briefly an object lesson in the matter of United States money. Here is a two-dollar note [exhibiting] which is printed by hand and likewise a five-dollar note. They contain on their faces these beautiful vignettes which, as I understand the matter, and I think I am not misinformed, can not be produced by a steam press. It is an utter impossibility to produce one single vignette on a steam press or to produce the beautiful scroll work on the back of the note. That can only be done on a hand press, as I am informed by a gentleman who, I think, understands this matter fully and who would not misrepresent the facts. These notes have never been counterfeited, and in my opinion they never will be counterfeited. Perhaps that is a violent assumption, but certainly the fact remains that they never have been counterfeited.

I have a note here [exhibiting] which is likewise hand work, but the Government thought it would be a little economical in printing this ten-dollar bill; and there are twenty-dollar bills of the same kind. It produced on the face of it a vignette that can not be produced on a steam press, but the Government used lathe work on the back of it. It is hand work, but it is cheap work. They did not produce the vignettes because it costs more to do it than to print the bill in this form, and that is just about the kind of work, only not quite so fine, which we will get if we resort to the steam presses discarded in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing ten years ago. These notes have been counterfeited. I do not know to how great an extent, but they have been counterfeited, and there are counterfeit notes out to-day, especially of the twenty-dollar note, where the lathe work was used on the back of the note.

I submit to the Senate that there is no argument whatever in favor of this great Government of ours, with the vast amount of paper currency that it has in circulation, for the purpose of economy, and economy alone, using an inferior means of making its money by putting on steam presses these securities and these notes and printing them in such a way that the counterfeiter may ply his art and rob the honest people of this country who have come in possession of this money with the understanding that it is the best money that can be produced on paper.

Mr. PASCO. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. PASCO. I should like to ask him how long the steam presses have again been in use? I understand they were set aside for some time and not used for a number of years. Can he tell how long they have again been in use?

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand they are not in use at all, but that the present Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing has recently ordered some presses. I have been informed—I do not assert that it is a matter of absolute accuracy—that he has undertaken to print some money and has made a botch of it, and that it has been thrown away. I was told yesterday by a gentleman whose word I implicitly accept in that regard that his first effort to print money was a complete failure to make decent money, but he is determined, unless stopped by Congress, to put in twelve, fifteen, or twenty of these presses—I do not know how many—and turn out these men who are making good money for the Government of the United States and manufacture this money for the people by machinery.

Mr. President, I have said all I care to say.

Mr. PASCO. I did not know how far it had ever advanced, and I thought perhaps the Senator from New Hampshire could give me the information. They were displaced, I understand, some years ago.

Mr. GALLINGER. About ten years ago.

Mr. PASCO. They were displaced on the ground that they did not give the Government the same high class of work that the hand presses did?

Mr. GALLINGER. That was the opinion of Congress.

Mr. PASCO. That was the reason of the action of Congress in displacing them.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was placed precisely upon that ground in the reports made to both the Forty-third and Fiftieth Congresses, made by committees which gave this matter most careful and painstaking investigation.

Mr. President, I understand the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing has recently purchased (I think I am correct) several of these presses and set them to work; and as I said a moment ago, I have been informed that his first effort has not been a phenomenal success; on the contrary, that it has been a failure. I do not speak for myself in this matter. I do not speak for the walking delegate. I do not speak even for the men who have been given employment by the Government, making for us the best paper money that the world has known. I speak for the people of this country, and I say it is an insult and an outrage upon the people of this country to offer them money that can be counterfeited more readily than other money can be counterfeited simply because the Government saves a few dollars in printing a hundred thousand dollars of its currency.

Mr. President, I say I speak for the entire people, and I regret exceedingly that any opposition is to be made to this very desirable proposition, and can only express the further hope that the Senate in its wisdom may adhere to the policy which Congress adopted ten years ago and insist that our notes shall be printed in the best possible manner, and that we shall not go into the purchase of steam presses for the purpose of grinding out money more rapidly or more cheaply than it can be manufactured by hand.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, if Senators care to listen, I think I can show them that this is not a question of the walking delegate. It is a question of the character of our currency. It is a question of true art in the manufacture of paper money.

When the roller passes over the ordinary form in the printing office—take our RECORD for example—it touches a raised surface and deposits some ink upon it. The roller does not work from side to side and attempt to do any fine placing of the ink. It merely brutally rolls over it, and that answers the purpose, because then the paper strikes the raised type. The manufacture of fine engravings of all sorts, whether in our notes or in the exquisite line engravings we hang upon our walls and worship and for which we pay $100 apiece, is an entirely different process. The ink there is not placed upon a raised surface. It is pushed and pressed and rubbed down into these fine lines that you follow on the beautiful vignettes there or in your fine line engravings at home. How is that done?

In the first place, take one of these plates, and you see the exquisite lines in the copper or in the steel laboriously cut in there. The roller is put over that, carrying the finest kind of ink. The roller goes over all this fine cutting and deposits a coat of ink over the whole plate, to some extent getting into the fine lines. Then the printer takes a soft rag, rubs it over carefully, avoiding, if possible, rubbing lengthwise any of these fine lines lest he take the ink out. He knows just where the soft cloth ought to pass. Then he takes the ball of his hand and rubs. Take those fine lines in the face, for example. He rubs very carefully across the lines so as to leave ink in there, and not only leave it there, but be sure to press it into the fine lines. After he has done that, he puts his paper upon it, applies a very powerful hand press, and out comes the beautiful engraving which you can not produce by the steam press to save your life; and you are offering an advantage to the counterfeiter by using any other than the hand process.

Now, I should like to read this. Here is a veteran printer whose testimony is published in a document printed in the Fiftieth Congress, and he describes the process. I will venture to trouble the Senate by reading it:

> Typographic printing and plate printing are based upon two different principles. In typographic printing the part which shows black is the print is the raised part, and the same is true in printing from wood. In printing from wood the raised part strikes against the paper and shows black. In printing from plates, such as are used in internal-revenue stamps and such as are used in the Government currency, the part which shows black or shows in color is the depressed part.
> Senator HARRIS. The depressed part of the plate?
> Mr. RALSTON. The depressed part of the plate is the part which shows black or color. The way in which the plate printing is done throughout is as follows: The plate is engraved by the engraver; the parts which are to show black are dug out or cut out of the steel or copper plate; the plate is then put on the press for printing; the plate-printer goes all over the plate with his inked roller; after he has done that he takes his rag and wipes all the ink off the surface of the plate. That removes all the ink from the raised parts of the plate and leaves the ink in the depressions. I may now say that a great part of the skill in plate printing, and the taste which is shown by the mechanic in this operation, comes in in the wiping of the plate. Having wiped the plate carefully, he then polishes off the plate with the palm of his hand, using a little whitening. That removes all smut or dirt that may be on the plate. Then the plate is passed under a roller-press, and the paper upon which it is designed to print is pressed by this roller down to the plate, and it absorbs and takes up all the ink there is in the lines which have been engraved.
> When the paper is passed under the roller and is removed, these various lines show raised, as it were, above the surface instead of being indented, as in the case of ordinary printing. By running your thumb over the ordinary printing you will be able to discover that the lines are indented, but if you take an engraving and pass your hand over it carefully you will see that the lines are all raised above the surface.
> When the hand plate printer goes to work to do his printing, after having thoroughly inked his plate, he takes the rag and goes all over it carefully. He goes over it swiftly but carefully. In using the rag he is careful to wipe across the lines of the plate. If the rag which he uses was to follow the lines of the plate, it would wipe out the ink from the lines and would leave an imperfect impression. He avoids anything of that kind by passing the rag across the plate. Again, different parts of the plate are treated by the hand printer in different ways. If the lines are heavy, he is likely to wipe more from them than when they are light. When the lines are light and fine he wipes them lightly and finely so that every line may receive its due expression. This constant exercise of judgment and discrimination in going over the plate is the substantial reason why we contend that hand printing is superior to steam-press printing.

You have not a fine line engraving in your house printed by a machine. It will not do it. It will make a blotch of it. I do not see how on earth you are to put the ink down in these fine lines and then rub it off by some machine, and do it with the delicacy necessary to high art. Any engraver of first-class work in the world will tell you all this, and with more emphasis than I put upon it. You can not do the best work in any way except by the human hand, which for many things does the finest work. To make a fine box of mahogany or some other delicate wood, a perfect box, you want to give the manufacturer of it full discretion to do as he pleases, and you will find that he will make the only exquisite and perfect finish that can be made by the skin of the human hand. I have seen a man make a little box, to be used in a bank, expending his skill upon it, working, working, working hours upon a comparatively small box to get the fine polish. No rag, no roller, no leather put over it will do it like the ball of the hand.

I say you make it comparatively easy to counterfeit by using a steam press. The rude machine which runs over puts on ink indiscriminately, and then you lay the white paper upon it, and it is pressed. The counterfeiter can do that very easily. You can immediately distinguish, after you have paid the least attention to the matter, between the hand work and the steam press.

I hope that the Senate will do as Congress did six and eight years ago and say that these classes of fine work shall be done in the best style, and in the only good style known to the art.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, I wish to add a word to what the Senator from Connecticut has so well stated in his description of the method of hand plate printing. In plate printing they use a plate containing four of these beautiful notes. As the Senator has said, the workman runs the ink roller over the plate by hand and the ink is pressed into all the fine lines. Then he takes a fine cloth and rubs it over the face of the plate, taking off all the surplus ink. After that he takes a little whiting and rubs the plate again with the ball of his hand in this way [indicating], smoothing the surface and pressing the ink into the very finest of the lines.

Mr. HAWLEY. Pardon me—and taking care to rub across the finer lines lest he take out the ink.

Mr. KYLE. That is it. He rubs across the finer lines. Now, let me add to what the Senator from Connecticut has already stated. The machine consists of a disk about 5 feet in diameter, horizontal, with an endless chain. Upon the endless chain four of these plates are placed, following each other in succession under the ink roller and the press. As soon as each plate comes from the ink roller a man stands ready with a rag to wipe off the ink before it passes beneath the press. It passes so rapidly that he can only give the plate a "lick and a promise" at the very best. Where they are able to turn out from 800 to 1,000 of these notes per day by hand press they are turning out from four to five thousand notes by the machine press.

The work is done with great rapidity, and no workman is able to press the ink at all into the small lines or even to wipe off the surplus ink. There is no wiping with the hand, as is done with the hand press. An assistant stands ready upon the other side to take out the notes. It is impossible from the very nature of things that thorough work can be done, and there are often blotches of ink and dark spots on the notes. It is impossible to produce the fine work, such as the vignettes, upon the face of these notes.

This subject has been gone over, as stated by the Senator from New Hampshire, very thoroughly during past years. The Fiftieth Congress reported strongly against the machine press for the reasons just given, and to use them is to place a premium upon counterfeiting.

Now, Mr. Claude M. Johnson, Director of the Bureau, appointed during the past Administration, I believe, has said that he desires the machine press because the hand machines can not turn out the quantity of work necessary. He has given that as his reason; and yet it is stated on good authority that there are more of these notes, bonds, etc., piled in the storehouse than there have been for many years, and the men are not working full time. There are 750 of these fine workmen in the United States and 100 of them are out of employment and can be secured for service in Washington.

A short time ago Mr. Johnson discharged 30 men and gave as a reason that there was a surplus of notes and bonds piled in the storerooms and he did not have need for the extra number of men.

Mr. President, I submit that there is no reason whatever for resorting to the machine presses, and it is plainly a department where economy should not be considered at the expense of efficiency and accurate, careful work.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. CANNON. I trust, Mr. President, the amendment will receive the approval of the Senate and go into the bill. I am in favor of progress. I believe in the steam press for ordinary purposes, but its use for this work is a matter of retrogression. As a practical printer I know the steam press can not do this work and do it satisfactorily. I know there is not a Senator on this floor who, if he were transacting a private business in which it was required that such work should be performed, would for one instant place steam presses in his establishment with the expectation of turning out artistic and satisfactory notes, bonds, or bills.

It is more than the demand of organized labor, although that may be involved in it. If there is an effort, as has been suggested, to injure organized labor, it is a most serious reflection upon a department of the Government. But it is a transaction now involving not only the security of the bank notes of the United States, but it is also something involving even more. We are rapidly losing all the fine arts because of the determination of the world to have everything cheap, to have everything done by the most rapid method imaginable. We are losing the fine arts because we are taking away the occupation of men who perform artistic work. It seems to me that the Government ought to encourage the preservation of fine skill which is necessary in labor of this character.

I repeat, Mr. President, that, as a practical printer, I know, as does every other man who has had any acquaintance intimately with this kind of work, that you can not do by steam presses that which is required and that which is performed and can be performed by the hand presses.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, I have given this subject some attention in years gone by. I recollect that it came before the Senate very soon after I became a member here. I thought that the policy of the Government was fully established several years ago upon this subject, and that it was understood that the finer class of work at the Engraving and Printing Bureau should be done on the hand-roller presses. It seems to be generally recognized that the hand work is far superior to the work done by the machines. I have not the expert knowledge of the subject that some Senators have exhibited in discussing it. I was very much interested in what the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] said. I think it must be evident to those who have given the subject attention that the superior work done on the hand presses is the best preventive against the counterfeiting of our money. My disposition is to favor this amendment. I have favored this course in the past. I see no reason why we should now change the line of action that Congress has deliberately agreed to in the past, and I expect to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I have been interested also in the discussion of this question by Senators who have spoken for the amendment, and I shall be glad before discussing it myself to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The SECRETARY. After the word "retired," in line 12, page 27, insert:

Provided further, That no portion of the sum authorized to be used for plate printing shall be used for any printing of notes, bonds, checks, or internal-revenue stamps other than for printing from hand-roller presses.

Mr. HAWLEY. Postage stamps are left out.

Mr. ALLISON. I observe from the amendment as it now appears that postage stamps are not included, although it is perfectly well known to those who are familiar with the Bureau of Engraving and Printing that steam-roller presses are used in the manufacture of postage stamps and that fifteen of them have been in active use since 1894, with no objection coming from those who use hand-roller presses. Therefore it can not be said that the Bureau of Engraving and Printing has not used recently the steam presses.

We have had this question up for many years in both Houses. There was an elaborate report made some years ago as to the character of the work that could be done upon steam-roller presses. I have no doubt that in substance the statement read by the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Connecticut is true as respects the fine work used in the manufacture of circulating notes. But it is not the purpose, I understand, of the Treasury Department to use these steam presses in any way so as to impair the efficiency of those notes as far as they prevent counterfeiting or simulation. It seems to be a curious thing that the Secretary of the Treasury, in whose Department the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is, would direct and authorize the use of presses in his Department which use would result in facilitating counterfeiting.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask the Senator from Iowa a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the Secretary of the Treasury propose, then, not to print the fine currency, and those bonds, by steam presses?

Mr. ALLISON. I so understand; and later on I will have read a letter written by the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. HAWLEY. He is not good authority on the character of the work.

Mr. ALLISON. He is authority in the sense of knowing what is to be done. I do not, of course, quote him as authority respecting the character of this work? The Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, or the Director of that Bureau, is under the Secretary of the Treasury; and when Senators assume that the steam presses will be used in order to facilitate counterfeiting they assume that we have a Secretary of the Treasury who is absolutely innocent of the things in his Department and of what he ought to do.

Mr. KYLE. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me, I should like to state that I understand in experimenting in money during the past week whole batches of paper or of the money were spoiled.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know how that may be. Now, the Secretary of the Treasury has ordered these printing presses for a character of work, I understand, that can be done with perfect safety, where the character of the work will be as complete as is desired. I ask Senators why it is that they exclude postage stamps from these steam presses. They do it simply because they know, or ought to know (I have no doubt they do know, and for that reason they omit the use of postage stamps), that when the steam presses are used in a single color, such as green or carmine, as in postage stamps, they perform the work just as well as hand presses.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, may there not be another reason, or two other reasons? First, postage stamps are of comparatively little value, and, next, no man could have a basketful or a pocketful of postage stamps and undertake to pass them upon any community without at once being suspected of having secured them in some dishonest way. It would be a very easy matter to detect any man peddling out postage stamps, but it is not so easy to detect men who are offering counterfeit money to the community.

Mr. ALLISON. I thank the Senator for calling my attention to that reason, which I have no doubt is a very good one, in addition to the reasons which I have stated. But what is true of postage stamps is also true of tobacco stamps and of internal-revenue stamps. It is not the purpose, as I happen to know, of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to use these steam presses for the manufacture of tobacco stamps, for the reason that they are obliged to print them in such form as to prevent counterfeiting. So far as I am informed, it is the purpose of the Secretary of the Treasury to use only twelve of these presses, and to use them for work that can just as well be done in the old way by hand presses.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator from Iowa kindly specify——

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what I rose to ask.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish the Senator would specify on what the steam presses are to be employed.

Mr. ALLISON. They are to be employed in the manufacture of postage stamps and partially employed in the manufacture of internal-revenue stamps, but only for a portion of the printing, I understand. They are also to be used in printing the backs of circulating notes. We had a specimen of those notes presented here by the Senator from New Hampshire, showing simply one color or two, green and white. The steam presses do that work just as well as it can be done on hand presses.

Mr. HAWLEY. Impossible.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Connecticut says it is impossible, but I leave that to be discussed between him and the Secretary of the Treasury, who is responsible for the printing. If he thinks the Secretary of the Treasury will authorize the printing in a way to facilitate counterfeiting, then I shall be very much disappointed, because the amendment is a limitation upon the power of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury is the responsible officer, and we assume here by this limitation that it is his purpose to manufacture the backs of the notes in such way as to encourage counterfeiting. I have had the opinion that we could with safety leave this matter to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Before passing to another phase of this question, I want to call attention to the fact that the condemnation which is spoken of has never reached the extent suggested by the Senators who have spoken upon the subject. There never was a turning out or ceasing to use these presses because they did not perform the work. As Senators who have been here a good many years know, we have had this question up year in and year out, beginning, I believe, in 1880. At that time there was a patent steam press and the then Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was paying an annual rental of $500 each for the steam presses. That was an element in all the debates and discussions. Finally, after several times authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury especially to purchase steam presses, in 1889 we provided that a royalty not exceeding 1 cent per thousand impressions should be paid to the patentees, thus limiting their royalty to a very small sum. I do not remember how many impressions could be made annually. Then we provided—

That unless the patentees of said steam presses shall accept the $500 already paid as royalty on each press and the rate per thousand sheets herein provided the said presses shall not be used by the Government after the close of the present fiscal year.

I understand that they were used afterwards. The patentees submitted to this payment of royalty. So the matter went on, and the old presses gradually wore out and the Bureau ceased to use them.

In 1894 a steam press was devised without any royalty being paid, I think perhaps in the Bureau itself, or in some way at least so as to avoid the royalty. Those presses were used in the printing of postage stamps, and have been so used and are now being so used.

Now, that is one difficulty. Another difficulty is the one suggested by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE], that under existing conditions, if I may use that term, it is practically impossible for the Government to go on and print the necessary impressions unless they supplement hand printing partially by means of the steam presses. So far from there being a large amount of notes, bills, securities of one kind and another, and stamps on hand, it is estimated that there is not a thirty-days' supply of circulating notes, and that there is not exceeding a thirty-days' supply of postage stamps or of internal-revenue stamps.

The Bureau of Engraving and Printing have asked Congress for two or three years to provide for building an addition to their establishment in order that it might be enlarged so as to secure an additional and a necessary supply of these stamps. We have refused to give them the appropriation for the additional building, so that under existing conditions it is impossible for the Government, with the small room they have in the present building, to carry on the necessary work there by means of hand presses.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to ask the Senator on that point if he can state authoritatively whether the printed statement by Mr. Szegedy, president of the Plate Printers' Union, that there are now forty idle hand-roller presses in the Bureau is correct or not? Mr. Szegedy makes the statement, and he has made it to me personally, that there are at the present time forty idle hand-roller presses in the Bureau, and that they are idle for the very reason that they are about introducing the steam presses, which is a more expeditious way of doing the business.

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer that question as I understand it. I may not have the details as I should have them. But the twelve steam presses are to take the place or rather the space of forty-three or forty-two hand presses, and of course when they take up that space the hand presses will be removed and must find lodgment elsewhere. I asked the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing what he intended to do with those hand presses. He said the hand presses would go into use; that if they had the room they could use them at any time, but they would gradually come into use as they were needed; that new presses or old presses not in use were constantly needed. That is the information I have from the Chief of the Bureau, and I think it is contained in the letters which I shall presently ask to have read.

Now, that is the present situation. At this time, with all the force and all the room they have in that office—and we do not give them an appropriation for an additional building—there is not a supply of internal-revenue stamps; there is not a supply of postage stamps; there is not a supply of one and two dollar bills or substituted national currency for national currency destroyed.

Mr. PASCO. If the Senator will allow me, it has been stated in this debate that there have recently been some twenty or thirty workmen discharged. I should like to have that explained, if the condition of things which he speaks of as existing is correct, that there is need for an additional building.

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer the Senator. Of course, in answering him I know nothing about it except what was said by the Chief of the Bureau, which was that he had made no discharges of what he considered effective workmen. Where they are good workmen, and they have now, I think, 320 of them employed in the Bureau, certainly over 300 (and all these plate printers are men highly skilled in the art), they earn, as I am told, from $5 to $7 a day each in the Bureau in the work they do. A plate printer is as necessary for a steam-roller press as he is for a hand press. The only difficulty is that a steam-roller press will do the work of five hand presses, and it, of course, needs four men for each roller press. I understand there have been no discharges of effective workmen; and the Chief of the Bureau especially states that none will be discharged; that he had use for all the competent hand-press men who are now in the Bureau.

I have stated the present condition. I do not like myself to anticipate what is to happen, but I can prophesy that in the very near future we shall largely increase the necessity for internal-revenue stamps, and we shall largely increase the necessity for other forms of securities that are to be used in our country; and yet with these new requirements and processes, with which I shall not now deal, we are tying the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury so that it will be impossible for him to do what we may require him to do respecting the great subjects of internal revenue, etc.

Mr. KYLE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALLISON. In a moment.

So whatever we do, it seems to be that this is a poor time for us to be putting ourselves in a position where it will be absolutely impossible for us to produce a sufficient amount of postage and internal-revenue stamps of the character we may need and such as we ought to have, and possibly, also, the securities that we may need.

Mr. KYLE. If the Senator will allow me, I understood him to state in the beginning of his remarks that it was not the intention to use the machine presses for bonds, notes, checks, and internal-revenue stamps.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not so state.

Mr. KYLE. I understood the Senator to so state.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not so state, nor do I so understand it. It is the intention to use the steam presses, as I understand, for the backs of bank notes and greenbacks, and to use them in part for the manufacture of internal-revenue stamps.

I wish to say that I have no care personally about this matter. I only feel bound, as representing the Committee on Appropriations, to state the truth as I understand it, and to call attention to all the facts as they exist with reference to the subject. I certainly have no desire to interfere with the proper employment and occupation of any of the worthy men who are employed in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. I do not believe a single one of them will be discharged under any circumstances, and probably there will be a greater number required before long.

I ask that the letters which I send to the Secretary's desk, which were written to me by the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING,
March 31, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 30th instant requesting that I prepare in writing a full statement of the situation relative to the use of steam power plate-printing presses in this Bureau.

As you are aware, owing to the restrictions which Congress placed upon the use of the steam power plate-printing presses in this Bureau for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1890, in the act approved March 2, 1889 (Statutes at Large, volume 25, page 939), making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for that year, the use of these presses was discontinued June 30, 1890. An examination of this act and the report of the Senate Committee on Finance, made at the time, will show that the restrictions placed upon the use of these presses were not on account of the inferiority of the work produced by them, nor were they directed to the actual discontinuance of the use of the presses, but were aimed at the royalties paid by the Government for their use.

The prohibition was that unless the patentees would accept royalty at the rate of 1 cent per 1,000 impressions, the presses should not be used by the Government. Had, therefore, the parties who owned the patents existing at that date been willing to accept the royalty specified in the act, the use of the presses would have been continued. These restrictions were held to apply only to the fiscal year for which the appropriation to which they were attached was made. They were not inserted by Judge Richardson in the Supplement to the Revised Statutes, embracing statutes general and permanent in their nature, authorized by Congress. (See Supplement Revised Statutes, volume 1, page 698.)

The Senate Finance Committee, which made a thorough investigation of the subject, reported on February 15, 1889 (Senate report, Fiftieth Congress, second session, No. 2994), and reached the following conclusion. I deem it proper to quote extensively from this report, as it fully covers all the questions involved in this controversy:

"Your committee have fully investigated the acceptability to the general public of the certificates, notes, internal-revenue stamps, postage stamps, and postal notes, in the printing of which steam presses are used. No complaint has been made against internal-revenue stamps, postage stamps, or postal notes thus far. The Postmaster-General has cordially approved of this method of printing postage stamps and postal notes. As to the silver certificates, the backs of which are printed by steam presses, the evidence shows that they are circulating not only without complaint from the public, but with the affirmative approval of banks and bankers.

"It has been urged that steam-press prints were the more easily counterfeited. A thorough inspection fails to establish this fact. The records of the secret service division of the Treasury Department certainly disprove it. The concurrent testimony in favor of such prints by the eminent bankers whose letters are incorporated with this report are entitled to the highest consideration upon that point. Steam-press work has certainly been long enough in use and circulation to have aroused complaint of its liability to counterfeiting if any such liability existed.

"A full investigation of the economy effected by the use of the steam press, as compared with the hand press demonstrates that an equal amount of work can be done by steam presses at from 35 to 65 per cent less cost, doubtless averaging 50 per cent. And it is estimated that the increase in the expenses of the Bureau, should the pending bill be adopted, would be nearly $353,000. From a thorough examination of the subject the committee is satisfied that there is more uniformity in the work of the steam presses than in that of the hand presses; that the average product of the steam press is quite equal to the average of the hand-press work, and that it is produced at one-half the cost of the latter.

"It has been urged that the introduction of steam printing presses has resulted in lower and insufficient compensation to those employed in the printing. The evidence is conclusive that such is not the case. There is no doubt, also, that the adoption of the bill would necessitate a considerable expenditure for more ample accommodations for printing, thus further increasing the cost to the Government.

"Another fact was demonstrated upon examination, that, if the bill should become a law, there are not sufficient number of hand plate printers in the country to supply the Government and also provide for the wants of private parties who are engaged in this branch of business.

"The passage of the bill has not been urged in terms as against the use of labor-saving machinery by the Government. On the contrary, one of the most distinguished gentlemen pressing the bill expressly states:

"'It is not opposition to the introduction of labor-saving machinery which prompts the writing of this letter. I am in favor of labor-saving machinery wherever it can do the work as well as by hand. It is my experience that the introduction of a machine gives employment to more workmen, both in the management of the machine and in the construction of them.' (From letter of T. V. Powderly, general master workman, Knights of Labor.)

"The passage of the bill, it is submitted, would be a legislative encroachment upon the executive branch of the Government. Such an attempt on the part of Congress to designate the machines that should be used, the particular workmen who should be employed, and the particular skill they should possess, or the details of methods by which printing should be done, can not, in the judgment of your committee, be defended. It must be assumed that able and expert men will be heads of bureaus, and the Department may well be trusted to judge and determine the character of the work necessary to meet the requirements of their Departments, respectively, and that they may equally be trusted to protect the interests of the people.

"The committee therefore report back the bill with the recommendation that it do not pass, and submit herewith the testimony taken in connection with the subject."

Upon assuming charge of the Bureau I found the facilities that had been introduced to execute the work after the discontinuance of the steam-power plate-printing presses still in operation, and notwithstanding that Congress had provided for an additional wing for the hand-roller presses, at a cost of $80,000, the space in the building was inadequate to the proper execution of the work and the employees were consequently very much crowded, and it was impossible to increase this force to a sufficient extent to execute the work of the Government within the regular hours.

During the panic of 1893 the plate printers were compelled to work until 6 o'clock each day for a very considerable period. Some method had to be adopted by which the work could be performed, and consequently a considerable quantity of work covering the internal-revenue stamps used on cigarettes, was transferred to typographic presses. At that time it was thought the steam-power plate-printing presses could not be used. Subsequently, I had occasion to submit a proposition to the Postmaster-General for the printing of postage stamps, and at that time the whole question of the use of such presses having been considered, the proposition submitted for the printing of postage stamps contemplated their execution on steam-power plate-printing presses. The proposition of this Bureau was accepted by the Postmaster-General, and immediately thereupon ten of these presses were ordered of a press-building firm, and were, as rapidly as constructed, put in use in printing postage stamps. Subsequently, the demand for postage stamps necessitated an order for three additional presses, making in all thirteen presses of this class in use in this Bureau since 1894 on this work.

The printing produced during these years upon the presses has been entirely satisfactory. In view of the satisfactory results obtained with these presses upon the postage stamps, I deemed it my duty to call the attention of the present Secretary of the Treasury to the fact that a considerable volume of the work on securities, other than postage stamps, could be executed upon such presses with a greater degree of uniformity than on hand presses and at a saving of $90,000. After consideration of the matter, the Secretary authorized the construction of twelve additional steam power plate printing presses for use in printing backs of United States and Treasury notes and silver certificates. These presses are now being placed in position for use in this Bureau, and it is to their introduction that the plate printers are objecting. No objection has been made on their part during the past four years to the use of the thirteen presses upon postage stamps.

One of the elements under consideration between the Secretary and myself when this mattter was first called to his attention was the necessity of placing this Bureau upon a basis where the employees would not be required to work beyond the regular hours; that is, from 8 a. m until 4 p. m. It is impracticable to permit the plate printers to work a continuous eight hours, as that would require the other employees, such as superintendents, helpers, counters, etc., whose services are necessary to enable the printers to obtain their plates, paper, and other material, to render more than eight hours' services, and for all of the time rendered by them beyond eight hours, they claim additional compensation, which the Solicitor of the Treasury has decided they are entitled to and can be paid. The Secretary, as well as myself, desired to stop the payment of this extra compensation, which was a serious drain upon the appropriations made by Congress.

The necessity for the recent discharge of thirty plate printers from the Bureau is explained by the fact that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue recently very largely reduced his orders, and as the Bureau is dependent upon the orders of the officers having charge of the work for authority to print the securities and stamps, it was necessary to reduce the force. In making the selections for this reduction, the least efficient men were chosen. The orders now in hand will, in my judgment, insure that no further reduction of the force of plate printers will be made. This statement, of course, is made in view of the orders now in hand, and the estimates of the various officers having charge of the service for the coming fiscal year. It will depend, however, largely upon the actual necessities of the service.

The adoption of the amendment suggested would not only prevent the placing of this Bureau upon the efficient footing desired, and require the continued payment of $120,000 a year for the performance of this work which could otherwise be done for $90,000, but it would also necessitate the execution of postage stamps on hand-roller presses. As the printing by hand of the immense number of these stamps required would be utterly impracticable, it would be impossible for this Bureau or any other establishment to supply the postage stamps needed. Another serious objection to the adoption of such restrictive legislation is the fact that in the event of any great and unusual demand for notes or bonds, requiring prompt and immediate delivery, this Bureau would be restricted to the use of hand presses. During the last Administration, when bonds were issued, we were required to make prompt delivery of them, and it was found necessary to use typographic presses for parts of printings thereon. Had any restriction been placed upon the use of steam presses it would have seriously interfered with the execution of this work. The present would appear to be a very bad time to adopt any such restrictions.

In conclusion I beg to say that I look upon this question simply as a matter of public business, in which I feel that I, as a public officer, should make such recommendation as will insure the execution of the work under my care in the most perfect, expeditious manner, and I believe that by the use of improved machinery that this can be done in the printing of the backs of notes and certificates of the Government. I beg to send herewith copy of a memorandum on this subject submitted by me to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Respectfully, yours,

CLAUDE M. JOHNSON, Director.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. ALLISON. As the pending bill will probably not be concluded to-night, I ask that the second letter and the memorandum which I have sent to the desk may be printed in the RECORD without reading. I shall not take the time of the Senate to have them read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that will be the order.

The letter and memorandum referred to are as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING,
April 2, 1898.

SIR: In answer to your verbal inquiries relative to the use of steam plate-printing presses in this Bureau, I have the honor to say that hand-roller plate-printing presses cost $156.75 each. A stock of these presses is retained on hand constantly over the number in use, to take the place of worn-out and discarded presses.

As to the comparative quality of printing the backs of bank notes upon hand-roller presses and steam plate-printing presses, I beg to say that this is a matter which was very thoroughly considered before action was taken by the Secretary of the Treasury and myself, and that no one could possibly be more interested or careful in the consideration of this question than the Secretary of the Treasury.

The claim made by plate printers that increased danger from counterfeiting will result from the use of steam presses for the printing of the backs of bank notes is raised by them simply by way of argument, without any substantial ground whatever to stand upon. Surely the Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of this Bureau, being directly responsible, are the officers of the Government who feel the deepest concern upon this point, and would naturally exercise the greatest care.

I am also informed that it is further claimed that a great many plate printers are out of employment. I beg to say that this is not the case. I will venture the assertion that there are not to-day ten unoccupied first-class plate printers whose services could be procured for work in this Bureau in the event of any considerable increased demand for its product. There are possibly forty or fifty printers unoccupied. Of that number but very few are good workmen.

As to space for additional hand presses, I desire to say that this office has recommended year after year during my administration, as well as that of my predecessor, and even prior to his incumbency, an appropriation for additional buildings in which to place our ink mill, rag laundry, storeroom, etc., with the expectation that the main building would be relieved, so that more space might be made in that way, but without avail. In rearranging the presses recently, on the completion of the center wing of the building, every foot of space available for presses was occupied; and then, considering the orders for plate-printed work, we did not have sufficient hand presses in position to meet any excessive demand upon this Bureau.

I stated to you orally that no discharge whatever is contemplated on account of the use of these steam presses, and should the orders for work continue to increase as they have in the past, I have no doubt but that the roll of plate printers can be maintained as at present.

I desire to call your attention to the fact that the deliveries made by this Bureau during the month just past were over 9,000,000 sheets, that being the largest aggregate deliveries of finished work ever made in one month by this Bureau, and larger than the estimated monthly average for the year, which has never before occurred. This fact must impress your mind with the absolute necessity of increasing the physical force of this Bureau.

Respectfully, yours,

CLAUDE M. JOHNSON, Director.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MEMORANDUM RELATIVE TO THE USE OF STEAM PRESSES IN PRINTING THE BACKS OF BANK NOTES.

The question of the use of improved machinery in the manufacture of all articles to which it can be adapted by private corporations is one that has been settled by actual experience. No corporation doing business for profit fails to take advantage of the use of machinery in place of hand labor wherever it is possible to derive a benefit thereby, and to give a like benefit to the consumers of its products. The cost of all the necessaries and luxuries of life has been decreased by the use of improved machinery in the past, and unquestionably the cost of manufactured articles of all kinds will continue to decrease until machinery becomes absolutely perfect.

It is not the policy of any private corporation to continue to employ labor when the same result may be attained by the use of machinery. It seems to me, therefore, it is the duty of a public official representing the taxpayers of the country, in the expenditure of money collected for the purpose of maintaining the Government, to conduct the business of the branch over which he presides by the same methods he would if employed by a private corporation. Therefore, in the direction of the business of the Bureau, I have conceived it to be my duty to suggest to the Secretary of the Treasury the introduction of steam-power presses for the purpose of printing the backs of bank notes; because—

First. By their use $60,000 per annum of the public money can be saved.

Second. The physical force of this Bureau is becoming inadequate to meet the requirements of the Government.

Third. The available space in the building is also becoming inadequate to meet the gradual increase of the work.

Although Congress in 1880 appropriated $80,000 for an extension of the building by the construction of a wing on the west, and in 1894 and 1895 appropriated $50,000 for an extension by adding three stories to the center wing, yet the Bureau is now crowded in certain branches of its work, particularly in the plate-printing press rooms. The crowded condition of the main press room on the third floor is a matter of comment by all visitors to the establishment.

Fourth. It has been demonstrated by actual experience in this Bureau that backs of bank notes can be printed upon steam-power presses more uniformly and as perfectly in every other respect as they are now printed by hand presses.

There are not enough first-class plate printers available to-day to do the work of the Government in cases of great emergency, except by working overtime. It would appear, therefore, to be good policy to increase the ability of this Bureau to perform its work under any emergency that might arise. I am of opinion that every first-class plate printer who is a reliable workman can be given employment, and any reduction which may follow the purchase of additional power presses will be made in dropping men who are now employed because it is necessary to retain unreliable printers.

We now have over 300 plate printers upon our rolls. Out of that number there are at least 50 men who can not, or do not, do good work, who will remain absent without leave, thus causing the Bureau the loss of the product of their presses, and who each pay day, if they report for duty, show evidences of excessive drinking and nervousness that virtually incapacitates them for good work.

The purchase of these presses will place the Bureau in a position to be independent of men of this character. It will also enable the Bureau to accumulate a stock of finished work, thus making deliveries of seasoned in place of green printing, which never lasts as well as when it is seasoned. This it has never been able to do because of its want of printing capacity, and should the policy be adopted which, in my opinion, is inevitable, of renewing the currency of the country very much more rapidly than it has been in the past, without these presses this Bureau would not be able to meet the demands made upon it by the Treasurer of the United States. I consider the frequent renewal of the currency one of the greatest safeguards against successful counterfeiting, and a policy will probably be adopted within the near future of keeping a stock of notes at the various subtreasuries, so that the banks can be supplied with new in place of old, worn-out notes, thus saving the cost of transportation and loss of interest by reason of time consumed in transit.

As before stated, in the event of a policy of this kind, these presses would be absolutely essential. It is not intended to discharge at once any great number of printers. In fact, the natural increase of the business of the country will continue to keep employed about the number of printers that we now have on our rolls, regardless of the use of steam presses. The poor element will be culled out gradually, but all of the worthy men will be kept employed. It has been my policy not to appoint additional apprentices, who overcrowd the printing trade. In fact, there has not been an apprentice appointed for about fifteen months, and during the time that I have been Director of the Bureau there have been more printers employed than ever before in its history, and I believe that this condition will continue, regardless of the use of steam presses for printing the backs of bank notes.

Congress makes appropriations for the purpose of producing Government securities, expecting of the executive officers that they will be executed at the lowest possible cost, attaining at the same time the highest quality of work. It seems to me, therefore, that if the executive officers fail to utilize machinery that will reduce the cost of the work materially, as in this case for the purpose of continuing men at work, that they are without warrant of law, and upon pure executive authority undertaking to give a gratuity to a class of people who have rendered no service that entitles them to such. Under the conditions above stated, I do not believe that any labor organizations can justify a movement to prevent the officers of the Treasury Department from using improved machinery in the production of material which it alone can furnish.

CLAUDE M. JOHNSON,
Director of Bureau.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that it is evidently impossible to conclude its consideration this afternoon, and I desire that we may have a short executive session. I also desire to report, from the Committee on Printing, a concurrent resolution, if the Senator from Iowa has no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield for that purpose.

PRINTING OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. GORMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report a concurrent resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland reports a concurrent resolution, which will be read.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed for the use of the Senate and House of Representatives 20,000 copies, to be included in one volume, of the message of the President of the United States on the relation of the United States to Spain, and the message of the President of the United States transmitting consular correspondence respecting the condition of the reconcentrados in Cuba, the state of the war in that island, and the prospects of the projected autonomy, 13,500 for the use of the House of Representatives and 6,500 copies for the use of the Senate.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 12, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

NAVAL BATTALION, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HILBORN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the table Senate bill No. 1316, to provide for organizing a naval battalion in the District of Columbia, and ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged resolution——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill indicated by the gentleman from California, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like an explanation of this bill. But in the first place, I should like to ask the gentleman from California this question: Does this bill propose to permanently increase the naval force of the United States?

Mr. HILBORN. As the bill is reported it does to the extent of these three companies forming this battalion of naval militia in the District. It will increase the general militia force of the District, of course, to that extent.

Mr. BAILEY. If it increases it, I shall object.

There was a bill pending before that committee affecting some organization of a naval battalion here which I agreed I would not object to, provided it was organized as a part of the militia force of the District now allowed by law.

Mr. HILBORN. An amendment of that character would effect the purpose of the gentleman.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the gentleman propose to offer that amendment?

Mr. HILBORN. Of course, if that will remove the gentleman's objection, I shall ask the adoption of such an amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. I have no objection in the world to making it a part of the militia force now allowed by law for the District; but I will object unless the amendment is adopted to conform to that view.

Mr. HILBORN. I did not know that there was any such stipulation, but if the gentleman insists upon that amendment going in——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, there was at least a stipulation on my part. I objected to this proposition once before, in the last Congress, and I agreed that I would not object to it at this time, if it was amended in the way I suggest.

Mr. DINGLEY. I want to ask if this is not a Senate bill, with a House bill similar?

Mr. HILBORN. Yes.

Mr. DALZELL. And this is on the Speaker's table, and privileged.

Mr. BAILEY. It will have to go to the Committee of the Whole, then.

Mr. HILBORN. The Senate bill which is under consideration is identical with House bill 1152, introduced into this House by myself. The same bill was introduced in the Senate by Mr. HALE. The House bill was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and has been reported favorably, and is now on the Calendar. The Senate bill came over here and is on the Speaker's table. Now, I call up the Senate bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I make the point of order that this bill must be first considered in Committee of the Whole, and that it can not be called up as a matter of privilege in this way.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is the House bill on the House Calendar?

Mr. HILBORN. Yes; the bill is on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The House bill is on the House Calendar, but if it is wrongfully there the point of order would be good. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas on the point of order.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, it does not appear to me that the point of order need to be more than stated. The bill creates three companies in addition to those now allowed by law. If this kind of a bill could be considered in the House without reference to the Committee of the Whole, then a bill creating any number of offices could be so considered. Yet the practice has been uniform that any bill creating additional offices or providing for the appointment of additional officers or that makes any charge upon the public Treasury, must be first considered in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to inquire whether this Senate bill is identical with the House bill?

Mr. HILBORN. It is.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then the question is whether the House bill is on the wrong Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The question is whether this involves an appropriation.

Mr. DINGLEY. I took it for granted, the House bill being on the House Calendar, that it did not involve an appropriation. I did not know what the terms of the bill were.

The SPEAKER. It requires certain officers to be appointed. Whether there is any general law giving them pay or not does not appear.

Mr. DINGLEY. The point of order would be good, then, if that is the case.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman concedes that the point of order is well taken.

The SPEAKER. The question, then, is one for unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. I hope the gentleman from California [Mr. HILBORN] will agree to offer the amendment and support it. I will say frankly to the gentleman that I should prefer these companies to be naval, rather than a part of the military establishment of the Government, and I have absolutely no objection to making them naval instead of military companies; but I do object to creating new naval companies and still leaving the military companies to be provided, as the law now allows.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will not the gentleman from Texas consent that this bill may come up, and then that such an amendment may be offered as he suggests? In view of the situation of the country it seems to me that we ought to be considering bills of this kind.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask the gentleman from California——

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. BENNETT. During the Fifty-fourth Congress I presented a bill for the establishment of a naval militia in the District of Columbia, and I can see no objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas. I hope the gentleman from California will consent to have the amendment offered.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman from California ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of this bill? Then any amendment can be offered that may be suggested.

Mr. BAILEY. I am willing to have the matter go over until we can have a report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and thus determine exactly what is the situation of the country.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think the situation is of a character that we need no report to intensify it.

Mr. BAILEY. Unless there is a better foundation for that opinion than there was for the opinion last Monday that the President's message was likely to create a riot in Havana, I am not willing to accept it. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] It might have created a riot in Cuba, but it would not have been among the Spaniards in the cities. It would have been among the insurgents in the interior. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. I did not suppose this discussion was in order, but

I have not objected, because it seems to amuse the gentleman from Texas and his friends on the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California desires to submit a request for unanimous consent. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 1316.

Mr. BAILEY. I object, unless the gentleman agrees to that amendment.

Mr. HILBORN. Very well; I am very anxious to get this bill passed. I consent, then, to the amendment.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, let us have the bill reported again.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the bill, if there be no objection.

The bill was again reported.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask the gentleman from California a question.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, what further need have we of an army or navy, anyhow? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Are the companies now in the District militia not now up to the full force allowed by the law?

Mr. HILBORN. I understand that is not so. There is room for these.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. HILBORN. I understand that is not so. There is room for these three companies, and they have already been organized, and have been for a year or more.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, before we go to the consideration of this bill, I want to know of the gentleman from California whether or not this measure, if it should become law, would involve an expense upon the District of Columbia; and if so, how much?

Mr. HILBORN. No; if this proposed amendment prevails, it will not be an addition, but would be a part of the regular force of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman does not answer my question, Mr. Speaker. I want to know from the gentleman from California whether, if this measure should become law, it would involve an expense upon the District of Columbia?

Mr. HILBORN. No additional expense.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RIDGELY. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Kansas.

LEAVE TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to ask permission of the House to sit during sessions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks the consent of the House that the Committee on Foreign Affairs may sit during sessions of the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE YALOBUSHA RIVER, MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. FOX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 8569.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8569) providing for the construction of a bridge across the Yalobusha River, between Leflore and Carroll counties, in the State of Mississippi.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Yazoo and Mississippi Valley Railroad Company, a corporation created and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Mississippi, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a railway bridge across the Yalobusha River at or near the railroad station known as Dodds Ferry, in Carroll County, Miss., the said bridge to be so constructed as not to unreasonably interfere with the navigation of said river and to be provided with a suitable draw: Provided, That a bridge constructed under this act and according to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be known and recognized as a post route, and the same is hereby declared to be a post route; and the United States shall have the right of way for a postal telegraph across said bridge.

SEC. 2. That the bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be located and built under and subject to such regulations for the security of the navigation of said river as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure that object the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War for his examination and approval a design and drawings of the proposed bridge and a map of the location giving, for the space of 2 miles above and 2 miles below the proposed location, the high and low water lines upon the banks of the river, the direction and strength of the currents at all stages of the water, with the soundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream and the location of any other bridge or bridges, such map to be sufficiently in detail to enable the Secretary of War to judge of the proper location of said bridge, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject, and until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War no work upon the bridge shall be commenced; and should any change be made in the plan of said bridge during the progress of construction, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 3. That Congress reserves the right to alter or amend this act at any time; and if at any time navigation of the said river shall in any manner be obstructed or impaired by the said bridge, the Secretary of War shall have authority, and it shall be his duty, to require the said bridge company to alter and change the said bridge, at its own expense, in such manner as may be proper to secure free from unreasonable obstructions the navigation of said river, and if, upon reasonable notice to said bridge company to make such change or improvements, the said company fails to do so, the Secretary of War shall have authority to make the same at the expense of said company; and Congress shall have power to do any and all things necessary to secure the free navigation of the river free from unreasonable obstructions.

SEC. 4. That said company shall be permitted to charge and take such rates of toll for crossing said bridge as may be reasonable, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 5. That the draw provided for the bridge herein authorized to be constructed shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passing of boats, and said company or corporation shall maintain, at its own expense, from sunset to sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Light-House Board shall prescribe.

SEC. 6. That all telephone and telegraph companies shall be granted equal rights and privileges in the construction and operation of their lines across said bridge; and if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized shall not be commenced on or before the 1st day of September, 1898, and be completed by the 31st day of December, 1899, the rights and privileges hereby granted shall cease and be determined.

SEC. 7. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains over the same and over the approaches thereto upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of said bridge and the several railroad companies, or any one of them desiring such use, shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid and upon rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridge, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties.

SEC. 8. That the said company may associate or join with themselves in the construction, maintenance, and operation of said bridge the Illinois Central Railroad Company, or any other railway company duly incorporated under the laws of the State of Mississippi.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

On page 3, line 4, after the word "alter," insert a comma and strike out the word "or."

On page 3, line 5, after the word "amend," insert a comma and the words "or repeal."

On page 3, line 10, after the word "secure," insert the words "the reasonably."

On page 3, line 11, after the word "free," strike out the words "from unreasonable obstructions, the" and insert the words "and unobstructed."

On page 3, line 12, after the word "river," strike out balance of section 3.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOX. I ask for the adoption of the amendments recommended by the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FOX, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SURVEY OF ELK RIVER, IN TENNESSEE AND ALABAMA.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7748) to provide for a survey of Elk River, in Tennessee and Alabama.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be authorized and directed to cause a survey to be made of Elk River, in Tennessee and Alabama, and that a report be made as early as practicable showing the probable cost of improving the river so as to make it available for light-draft steamers.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask for the consideration of the bill with the further amendment which I have sent up:

Amend by adding the words:

"The Secretary of War is also directed to report to Congress his opinion as to the advisability of the contemplated survey."

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask if that bill has been reported by a committee?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It has been reported. The report is in the hands of the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill as amended? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GAME BIRDS AND OTHER WILD BIRDS.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3589) to extend the powers and duties of the Commission of Fish and Fisheries to include game birds and other wild birds useful to man.

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Commission of Fish and Fisheries shall hereafter be known and designated as the United States Commission of Fish, Fisheries, and Birds. The duties and powers of said commission are hereby enlarged so as to include the propagation, distribution, transportation, introduction, and restoration of game birds and other wild birds useful to man. For such purposes they may purchase, or cause to be captured, such game birds and other wild birds as they may require therefor, subject, however, to the laws of the various States and Territories in which they may conduct such operations.

The object and purpose of this act is to aid in the restoration of such birds in those parts of the United States adapted thereto, where the same have become scarce or extinct, and also to aid in the introduction of new and valuable varieties or species of American or foreign birds in localities where they have not heretofore existed.

Said commission shall from time to time collect and publish useful information as to the propagation, uses, and preservation of such birds.

And the said commission shall make and publish all needful rules and regulations for carrying out the purposes of this act, and shall expend for said purposes such sums as Congress may appropriate therefor.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I think that there is something more important in these war times than hatching ducks and goslings; and I therefore object to the consideration of this bill. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

WASHINGTON AND GLEN ECHO RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 924) to authorize the Washington and Glen Echo Railroad Company to obtain a right of way and construct tracks into the District of Columbia 600 feet, with House amendments disagreed to by the Senate.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 924) to authorize the Washington and Glen Echo Railroad Company to obtain a right of way and construct tracks into the District of Columbia 600 feet.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Washington and Glen Echo Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Maryland and operating a street railway in said State, the eastern terminus being at or near the northern boundary of the District of Columbia in Chevy Chase, be, and said corporation is hereby, authorized and empowered to obtain a right of way and construct its road and lay double tracks thereon into the District of Columbia a distance of 600 feet, and no farther, from the point in the boundary line of the District where said railway extended crosses the boundary line of the District and from said point to a point on the west line of Connecticut avenue extended, on a route to be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, said corporation to have full power and authority to operate cars upon said road for the purpose of its traffic; said corporation to use electric motive power in propelling its cars: Provided, That no fares shall be charged or collected within the District of Columbia: And provided further, That unless the extension herein provided for shall be completed within six months from the date of the approval of this act, then this act shall be null and void.

SEC. 2. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The House amendments were read, as follows:

SEC. 2. That said railway company shall be constructed in a substantial and durable manner, and all rails, electrical appliances, etc., shall be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That if the said company in the construction of the extension herein authorized shall cross any public road or highway, the space between its tracks and rails and 2 feet exterior thereto shall be kept by it at all times in proper repair, to the satisfaction of said Commissioners of the District of Columbia. Should the said company fail to keep said space in repair to the satisfaction of said Commissioners, the work will be done by the District, and the cost thereof shall be collected from said company, as provided in section 5 of the act entitled "An act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia," approved June 11, 1878.

SEC. 4. That the said company shall furnish and maintain passenger houses, with suitable conveniences for the public, as required by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and shall use first-class cars on said railway, with all modern improvements for the convenience, comfort, and safety of passengers, and shall run cars as often as the public convenience may require, in accordance with a time-table approved by the Commissioners of said District. Every failure to comply with the conditions of this section shall render said company liable to a fine of $50, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction at the suit of the Commissioners of said District.

SEC. 5. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall make such regulations as to rate of speed and mode of use of tracks as in their judgment the interest and convenience of the public may require. Should the servants or agents of said company willfully or negligently violate such an ordinance or regulation, said company shall be liable to the District of Columbia for a penalty not exceeding $500.

SEC. 6. That all articles of value that may be inadvertently left in any of the cars or other vehicles of said company shall be taken to its principal depot and entered in a record book of unclaimed goods, which book shall be open to the inspection of the public at all reasonable hours of business.

SEC. 7. That such portion of said road as lies within the District of Columbia shall be deemed real estate, and, together with other real property and such personal property as is within the said District, shall be liable to taxation as other real and personal property in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which has just been reported to the House.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the present consideration of the House amendments to the bill which has just been reported, disagreed to by the Senate.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, this bill (S. 924) has been before Congress——

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to know what bill we are considering; the Chair has not stated, and some of us do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. It is Senate bill 924, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] has the floor and is about to give the committee full information in regard to it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the bill reported again to the Committee of the Whole, so we can know what it contains. There are a good many masked batteries in some of these bills and we want them read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the bill.

The bill was again read.

Mr. HENDERSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like the gentleman in charge of the bill to explain this fully to the committee, and give us a full idea of where this is to operate, and why.

Mr. FOOTE. I should like to inquire how much time the gentleman from Wisconsin has at his disposal?

Mr. PAYNE. An hour.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to agree upon the time for the discussion of the bill in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman want his time extended beyond the hour? I suppose he has an hour.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill that has been considered not only by the Fifty-fifth, but by the Fifty-fourth Congress. It passed both Houses in the Fifty-fourth Congress, but failed to secure the signature of the President.

Mr. PAYNE. Why?

Mr. BABCOCK. I am informed that the President had not the time to give it consideration. It is a very important matter. It extends 600 feet into the District of Columbia. And further, the committee will observe by a careful consideration of the bill that the railroad company is not allowed to collect any fares. All that ride on this portion of the road ride free.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is a very suspicious circumstance. Why is that? [Laughter.]

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will please be in order.

Mr. BABCOCK. This connection is made at Chevy Chase circle, and this bill permits this road to construct a track 600 feet into the District of Columbia and make a connection with the Capital Traction Company. It also permits them to build depots and other necessary buildings and improvements for the necessary operation of the road. The House Committee on the District of Columbia offered several amendments to the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before the gentleman passes from that point, I would like to ask him a question. Do I understand that it is a new company that is to build this 600 feet of road?

Mr. BABCOCK. No, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON. Suppose I buy a ticket from here to Chevy Chase, does that ticket permit me to ride over this 600 feet?

Mr. BABCOCK. I think not; but the gentleman can ride over the 600 feet without buying any other additional ticket, and can ride over it without paying any fare.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is it a part of the Capital Traction Company system?

Mr. BABCOCK. No.

Mr. HENDERSON. What is it for?

Mr. BABCOCK. It is to make connection with the Glen Echo Railroad. If gentlemen would take time to read the bill, they could see what it is for.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not see that those who read the bill are able to make it very clear to the committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. HANDY. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes.

Mr. HANDY. Does this 600 feet run on a public highway?

Mr. BABCOCK. I believe that it crosses a public highway.

Mr. HANDY. On whose property will it run; is it District of Columbia property now?

Mr. BABCOCK. No; oh, no. I do not think the District of Columbia owns any property out there.

Mr. HANDY. The authorization is to obtain a right of way that would require the railroad to purchase of the owners?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes; to purchase it. One of the amendments of the House committee was, in relation to crossing highways, that they should protect their tracks, macadamize between the rails and 2 feet outside, and another amendment was offered by the House committee in line with the policy of the committee to protect the public, and to see that the Commissioners of the District have proper supervision over this railway. It also provides for the taxation of any real estate the company may have in the District of Columbia, like depots or other buildings. They are obliged to pay taxes on it, and they are not allowed to collect any fares.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the Senate amendment interfere with the rights of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] to ride over the road?

Mr. BABCOCK. I think it would.

Mr. PAYNE. Then it ought to be defeated. [Laughter.]

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania suggests that the bill be read again.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman really desires to have it read, why, of course it ought to be; but it has been read twice.

Mr. BABCOCK. If the gentleman does not understand the bill, why, let it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the bill be read again. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think you can afford to read a bill three times that proposes to allow every fellow to ride free.

The Clerk again read the bill,

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the yielding spirit of the gentleman from Wisconsin. After having heard this bill twice read, I begin to comprehend the situation; but I think the statement in the bill is inaccurate when it says that no fare shall be charged over this extension of 600 feet. As I understand, the road running from Chevy Chase to Glen Echo is building this extension. Is that correct?

Mr. BABCOCK. That is right.

Mr. HENDERSON. Now, if I buy a ticket from Glen Echo to Chevy Chase, that ticket carries me to the terminus of the Glen Echo line, which includes the 600 feet.

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON. And in buying the ticket I pay for my ride on the 600 feet as well as on the other part of the road. So that this statement that there is to be no fare charged is inaccurate. On the other hand, if I get off the Traction Company's road at Chevy Chase and buy a ticket over this liberal line to the end of the route—Cabin John, I believe they call it—I have got to pay my fare over that whole line to Cabin John.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. HENDERSON. I will yield the gentleman the balance of my time if he desires it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I only want to make an inquiry.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then put your inquiry to the gentleman from Wisconsin in charge of the bill. Do not ask me any questions; I am hunting for light myself.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman has said that he thinks he would have to pay fare over the road from Glen Echo to its terminus at Chevy Chase, including the 600 feet. Now, I ask him this question: If he should get off at the District line, before reaching Chevy Chase, and then take a ride over those 600 feet in the District of Columbia, does the gentleman think he would be expected to pay for that?

Mr. HENDERSON. I would not be fool enough to get off at the District line. I would ride to the terminus, where I could get into a palatial car of the Traction Company, not into one of the rickety concerns of this Glen Echo road.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman does not answer my question.

Mr. HENDERSON. I answered the gentleman's question, including several other answers. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman, coming from Glen Echo, should get off at the intersection of the Glen Echo road with the District line, and then should take another car and ride those 600 feet to the terminus, he would not have to pay any fare for that ride. That is what the gentleman from Wisconsin meant.

Mr. HENDERSON. If I got off the cars and on again, I would expect to pay for my second ride as well as for the first.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I was supposing the gentleman would get out of his buggy.

Mr. HENDERSON. I say that this provision about free fares is simply a "blind" to carry through this bill, because this extension of 600 feet would be simply a part of the Glen Echo line, and when you pay your fare from Glen Echo to connect with the Capital Traction Company's line at Chevy Chase you pay for the whole ride on the Glen Echo road, including this 600 feet. There is no use trying to hoodwink us about this matter. If the gentleman from Wisconsin had only read and studied his own bill he would not have stuck a proposition of that kind into the bowels of it.

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. HENDERSON. I am willing to yield the gentleman the remainder of my ten minutes.

Mr. BABCOCK. I have had this bill read twice for the benefit of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have had it read once for the benefit of the gentleman from Wisconsin in charge of the bill, and with little effect, I think. [Laughter.] I begin to fear he is confusing the mind of the "Tall Sycamore" from Tennessee, a member of the committee. I think this bill ought to be recommitted, so that it may be comprehended by the committee reporting it.

Mr. BABCOCK. Did not the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HENDERSON. I said I would yield you back the remainder of my time, and I will do so cheerfully; I hope you will make good use of it.

Mr. BABCOCK. I suppose the fact that the gentleman can ride 600 feet on a railroad free of charge is something new to him—something that never occurred to him before.

Mr. HENDERSON. I never had the sensation in all my life. [Laughter.]

Mr. BABCOCK. This bill proposes that any citizen of the District of Columbia may go out there at any time when this road is in operation, get on a car and ride those 600 feet, and come back, without paying any fare at all.

Mr. FISCHER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FISCHER. I observe in lines 19 and 20, on page 2, the provision that "no fare shall be charged or collected within the District of Columbia." Would it not be possible for this railroad company to charge and collect fare for this distance when outside the District line? Is not the language so intended?

Mr. BABCOCK. I think if the gentleman from New York will retire to the lobby and sit down and read the bill carefully, he will fully understand it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON. He will probably understand it more than he can from the explanations given. [Laughter.]

Mr. FISCHER. I do not suppose the gentleman intends to apply this bill, or the motives of the bill, entirely to the "lobby?" [Laughter.]

Mr. BABCOCK. Oh, no; to the whole District.

Mr. FISCHER. Then I hope the gentleman will explain this provision to the House.

Mr. BABCOCK. What provision?

Mr. FISCHER. The one to which I have referred.

I have said that under the language of this provision of the bill which says that no fares shall be charged in the District of Columbia, it will be possible to charge and collect for that same distance beyond the District, beyond the District line; and the gentleman from Iowa understands the bill as I do. That is to say, that it does not provide that they may not charge this extra amount outside of the District.

Mr. BABCOCK. Does the gentleman desire to offer an amendment to make certain the point he has in mind?

Mr. FISCHER. Certainly I do, at the proper time.

Mr. BABCOCK. Very well; present it.

Mr. CANNON. But the bill has not been read for amendment yet.

Mr. FISCHER. I assume that the chairman will not object to the amendment, or insist on consulting the "lobby," at the proper time. [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question.

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I merely wish to ask whether this railroad is intended to burn coal or time? [Laughter.]

Mr. BABCOCK. I do not think the committee has investigated the motive power of it.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Or the "motives" of the bill, apparently.

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman heard the bill read. It is an electric railway, and electricity is generated by coal or wood. Now, I do not know whether they will use the one or the other in this case.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Oh, well, you had better take a vote on the bill. You will talk it to death.

Mr. BABCOCK. I wish to make, Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to know whether amendments are in order at this time, or not until it shall be read by paragraphs?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; this is a Senate amendment. The bill does not have to be read by paragraphs.

Mr. BABCOCK. So I understood.

Then I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BOTKIN].

Mr. BOTKIN. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that the people of this country, as well as the members of this committee, are interested to-day more in another question than this question of street railways. As I have occupied but little of the time of this committee or of the House during this session, I shall be glad to avail myself of the kindness of the gentleman from Wisconsin who has the bill in charge to occupy the attention of the committee for thirty minutes on the question of Cuba.

Mr. Chairman, it is impossible at this late day to add anything new to the discussion of the questions at issue between this Government and Spain. I only desire to record briefly my own convictions, and at the same time voice what I believe to be the sentiments of all patriotic Americans.

In considering the present strained relations between these Governments two distinct problems should be kept in mind, viz, the oppression of Cuban patriots and the destruction of the battle ship Maine. The civilized world holds the Spanish Government responsible for both. Every consideration of humanity requires the United States to issue, without an hour's delay, an imperative command to the oppressors to quit at once and forever the Western Hemisphere, and also to demand of Spain a full and speedy reparation for the loss of our ship and its lamented crew.

From the beginning of the period of Spanish atrocities in Cuba the American people have been wrought up to a high tension of feeling and indignation. During this same period the authorities of this Government have been so dilatory as to exhaust the public patience, to satisfy the most conservative noncombatant, as well as the most craven devotee of a cold-blooded commercialism to be found in this country or in Europe, and, in the judgment of thousands, to humiliate this great Republic in the eyes of Christendom.

Those members of Congress who have criticised the dilatory methods of our Government have been applauded by all the patriotic people of this country. But they have been contemptuously styled "jingoes" by the few who know and care more for the demands of Wall street and the money kings of Europe than for the will of the American people. The latest and most violent effusion of this kind appeared on April 1 in the Hartford (Conn.) Post, a paper owned and presumably controlled by John Addison Porter, private secretary to the President. I quote a few samples of this most vicious attack that has been made upon the American Congress for a generation, simply to show the venom of at least one Spanish sympathizer in this country:

In the whole history of the Congress of the United States that body has never before reached such a depth of degradation as during the present week. Under the guise of a desire to help a people struggling for liberty, it has kept up a constant agitation for some months in favor of intervention by the United States in behalf of the Cuban insurgents. Within the last week, however, it has thrown off its cloak and shown the true character of its conduct. Its motive in agitating the Cuban question has been, not a love of liberty, not sympathy with human suffering, but simply bloodthirstiness of the most savage description. It has been crazy to fight somebody, and Spain happened unfortunately to offer a convenient target.

After a discussion of the Maine disaster, in which Congress is condemned without stint for its attitude upon this question, while the Spanish Government is held up as a model of fairness and good faith, this modern apologist for the unspeakable crimes in Cuba says:

It is hard to believe that savages of this sort continue to display themselves in public in this last end of the nineteenth century of Christian civilization!

And why this senseless tirade—this screed so appropriately published on All Fools' Day? Simply that Congress, knowing the record of Spanish cruelties in every country over which her flag has floated for centuries and witnessing the crowning act of her infamies—her very intoxication with the blood of hundreds of thousands of her victims in the Island of Cuba—and moved by the dictates of reason, of justice, of humanity, of Christian civilization, demands that this Government shall terminate these horrors at once, even though it may require the military power to do it. If this constitutes jingoism, then this is a nation of jingoes. If this be savagery, we are savages. If to propose assistance to patriots struggling for independence and freedom from the most fiendish system of oppression and slavery of modern times is bloodthirstiness, we are bloodthirsty.

But this defender of Spanish atrocities threatens us with defeat at the polls. We accept the gage of battle. We are ready to meet him and his few friends, the Spanish bondholders, on the hustings and at the ballot box. The American people propose that Cuba shall be free, and will relegate to eternal oblivion any member of this body who stands in the way of this cause.

In defense of the Administration's dilatory policy, this writer says:

President McKinley, as is known to those who share his counsels, had already laid out his programme, even to the fixing of the final days and dates for each stage, before Congress made the first step toward interfering with its work.

If that is true, and the President knew he should on Monday, April 4, or at the latest on Wednesday, April 6, as was promised the country, send his message to Congress declaring for independence or intervention, or both, why did he not days and weeks ago direct General Lee to remove all Americans from Cuba? This would have prevented the disappointment of, not to say the insult to, the American people by the postponement of the message last week, under the pretext that its promulgation at that time would endanger the lives of Lee and his American associates.

In closing this most un-American editorial, Congress is thus classified:

Benedict Arnold himself was not a viler traitor than these men, and their memory and his should go into history side by side, stamped with the eternal infamy of having made merchandise of their most sacred public trusts.

I hurl the charge of treason back into the teeth of the writer, whoever he is. The Benedict Arnolds of this period are those who, like the author of this insult, would sacrifice national honor, the cause of freedom, and humanity itself upon the altar of a heartless commercialism. It is proper to say that the owner of the paper disclaims all responsibility for the offensive article. In a note published in the Washington Post of April 7 concerning it he says:

So far as the article which has caused criticism is concerned, I did not write it nor see it until two days after its publication, at which time I promptly sent a telegram to the managing editor of the Post, expressing disavowal and regret at the exaggerated tone of the article, and cautioning the editor to be more careful in the future.

And yet his paper of March 30 and of March 31 contained editorials on the same line of denunciation of Congress, and scarcely less bitter than that which he has felt called upon to apologize for. Further still, I am credibly informed that Mr. Porter, in a personal interview with well-known gentlemen, has admitted that while he did not write the offensive editorial, and that it was not diplomatically prepared, he did inspire its spirit.

In an editorial bitterly criticising Congress, Mr. Porter's paper, in its issue of March 30, said:

Our dispatches to-day show the lines on which the negotiations are speeding. It is asserted from Washington that Spain has consented to the following settlement of the troubles in Cuba:

1. Spain to recognize the independence of Cuba.
2. Cuba to pay Spain $200,000,000.
3. An armistice to be declared, during which the Spanish forces are to be withdrawn from Havana.
4. The reconcentrados to be fed, supplied with clothing, farming tools, and seeds by the United States and returned to their farms.

"This," says the writer, "is a consummation to be proud of."

On the contrary, it is a policy that will condemn its advocates to a just political oblivion in any and every State in this glorious Union. But it must be confessed that the people fear this to be the policy determined upon by the present Administration and enshrouded in secrecy to this hour.

In this connection the country should know that Congress has been flooded for several days with telegrams from men representing so-called business interests asking us to support the Administration in its Cuban policy, whatever that is; that these telegrams were inspired by messages sent out from Washington; and that one of the most notable of these inspiring messages was one sent by John Addison Porter.

This is simply a part of the game being played by and for the bond syndicates of the world—men who are determined that the unspeakable murder and misery in Cuba shall not be interfered with by this Government until they have perfected their arrangements for the perpetual bond slavery of that people. To show the death grip which the money power has upon the governments of the world, and how they control and use these governments to further their own mercenary interests, I quote from a letter in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of March 21, 1898, from its regular Washington correspondent:

"There will be no war," the American representative of the Rothschilds said in New York on Friday. He spoke with confidence which knowledge of the influences at work inspired. For two weeks the moneyed interests of the world have been quietly crowding Spain. They have negatived her appeals for loans. They have closed the ear of European courts to her advances for alliances.

It remains to be seen whether or not this Government, like those of Europe, is to continue under the domination of the Rothschilds and their agents.

Mr. Chairman, the American people well know that for about three years the most brutal warfare that disgraces the annals of time has been waged by Spain against her Cuban subjects. If our forefathers were justifiable in resisting oppressive taxation without representation, the Cuban patriots are engaged in the most holy struggle for freedom the world has ever witnessed. For three long years they have contended against great odds. Their homes have been destroyed; their old men have been wantonly murdered; mere boys have been shot down for utterances of patriotism; prisoners of war have been butchered; fair young women have been ravished by the inhuman Spanish soldiery; mothers and children and others equally helpless and innocent have been herded together by thousands, without food, clothing, or shelter, to die under the slow torture of starvation. And all this at our very door and under our eye.

We have heard much of the "unspeakable Turk" and his atrocities in fair Armenia. But I demand that our authorities shall consider the "unspeakable Spaniard" and his greater atrocities in Cuba, the gem of the southern sea. For three long years these revolting barbarities have been practiced by Spain. And yet this great Republic, the home of freedom and justice, has made no effort to bring them to a conclusion.

Saul of Tarsus stood by and held the garments of the murderers who stoned St. Stephen to death, thereby consenting to the awful crime. This Government is the modern Saul of Tarsus. From the highest official of this nation, and therefore of the world, has come no word of encouragement and assurance to those patriots in their unequal struggle for liberty. On the contrary, while admitting in message and otherwise the inhumanities of the Spanish people and the unparalleled miseries of the Cubans, this same high official has on different occasions spoken soft and honeyed words to and of the Government of Spain, expressive of high regard and confidential relations.

Mr. Chairman, the sympathy of the American people for the Cuban patriots and their horror and indignation toward the Spanish Government for its unutterable cruelties are not of recent origin. I desire to point out three facts of history that reflected public sentiment upon this question two years ago:

1. The extended and fervent discussion of Spanish atrocities and of Cuban independence by members of both branches of the Fifty-fourth Congress. There were no party lines. Sherman, of Ohio, and MORGAN, of Alabama, and ALLEN, of Nebraska, were among the leaders in the Senate favoring prompt and decisive action on the part of this Government. HITT, of Illinois, and the leading members of the House of all political faiths were no less emphatic for the Cuban cause. PROCTOR, GALLINGER, THURSTON, and other gentlemen whose statements so recently aroused the indignation of this country have added no material facts concerning Spanish cruelties to those that were given to the country two years ago by members of both Houses of Congress.

These later statements of the case were given, it is true, from personal observation, which adds interest and weight. Is it claimed that conditions are improved since Blanco superceded Butcher Weyler, and that this is a reasonable excuse for recent delays on the part of this Government? I reply that the observations of PROCTOR, GALLINGER, and THURSTON were made under Blanco's reign, and not under Weyler's.

I repeat that the speeches in the two Houses in February and March, 1896, that have not since been surpassed in ability and intensity, reflected the almost universal sentiment of Congress and the country at that time.

2. The resolutions adopted by Congress and the votes by which they were adopted reflected the sentiment of the people through their representatives. On February 5, 1896, Senator MORGAN, of Alabama, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That, in the opinion of Congress, a condition of public war exists between the Government of Spain and the government proclaimed and for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba; and that the United States of America should maintain a strict neutrality between the contending powers, according to each all the rights of belligerents in the ports and territory of the United States.

On February 28, 1896, Senator Cameron offered as an addition the following amendment:

Resolved further, That the friendly offices of the United States should be offered by the President to the Spanish Government for the recognition of the independence of Cuba.

Thus amended the resolution passed the Senate on the last-named date by a vote of 64 yeas, 6 nays, 19 not voting.

On March 2, 1896, Mr. HITT, of Illinois, chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted the following resolution as a substitute for the Senate resolution:

Resolved, That in the opinion of Congress a state of public war exists in Cuba, the parties to which are entitled to belligerent rights, and the United States should observe a strict neutrality between the belligerents.

Resolved, That Congress deplores the destruction of life and property caused by the war now waging in that island, and believing that the only permanent solution of the contest equally in the interest of Spain, the people of Cuba, and other nations would be in the establishment of a government by the choice of the people of Cuba, it is the sense of Congress that the Government of the United States should use its good offices and friendly influence to that end.

Resolved, That the United States has not intervened in struggles between any European governments and their colonies on this continent; but from the very close relations between the people of the United States and those of Cuba in consequence of its proximity and the extent of the commerce between the two peoples, the present war is entailing such losses upon the people of the United States that Congress is of opinion that the Government of the United States should be prepared to protect the legitimate interests of our citizens, by intervention if necessary.

This was adopted by a vote of 262 yeas, 17 nays, 76 not voting. The matter went into conference, and on April 6, 1896, the House agreed to the Senate resolution as adopted by that body on February 28. The final vote in the House stands—yeas 247, nays 27, not voting 80. All these votes were free from party bias, and represented the overwhelming sentiment of Congress and of the country on the Cuban question.

3. Lastly, I desire to introduce the platform utterances of the various political parties in their national conventions of 1896, as reflecting the sentiment of the country at that time. The Republican platform says:

From the hour of achieving their independence the people of the United States have regarded with sympathy the struggles of other American peoples to free themselves from European domination. We watch with deep and abiding interest the heroic battle of the Cuban patriots against cruelty and oppression, and our best hopes go out for the full success of their determined contest for liberty. The Government of Spain having lost control of Cuba and being unable to protect the property or lives of resident American citizens or to comply with the treaty obligations, we believe that the Government of the United States should actively use its influence and good offices to restore peace and give independence to the island.

Mr. BRUCKER. That platform was made to get in on, was it not?

Mr. BOTKIN. Yes; and no party dared go before the country at that time with a milder statement of the Cuban question.

The Democratic platform says:

The Monroe doctrine as originally declared, and as interpreted by our leading Presidents, is a permanent part of the foreign policy of the United States, and must at all times be maintained. We extend our sympathy to the people of Cuba in their heroic struggle for liberty and independence.

The Populist platform says:

We tender to the patriotic people of Cuba our deepest sympathy in their heroic struggle for political freedom and independence, and we believe the time has come when the United States, the great Republic of the world, should recognize that Cuba is, and of right ought to be, a free and independent state.

Thus the three leading parties of the country, representing almost the entire population, are practically a unit in their latest official deliverances upon this most burning question just now before the American people. And yet two years have dragged heavily by since these patriotic utterances were read by a delighted public. They have been two years of blood and carnage; two years of nameless atrocities practiced upon the innocent and helpless portion of the Cuban population; two years of waiting and vacillation on the part of our Government; two years of our quiet consent to these butcheries. And during these awful years two American Presidents have been brought under the grave suspicion of the American people as being under the powerful influence of bond syndicates, and as being controlled more by commercial considerations than by the interests of humanity and the cause of freedom.

The country had a right to believe that the new Administration would, without unnecessary delay, formulate and prosecute a vigorous American policy upon the Spanish-Cuban question. Accordingly, Mr. MORGAN, of Alabama, introduced into the Senate, on the 1st day of April, 1897, the resolution that had passed both Houses by overwhelming majorities—the Senate on February 28, 1896, and the House on April 6, 1896. The final vote was had upon this resolution on May 20, 1897, as follows: Yeas 41, nays 14, not voting 33. Party lines were again ignored, it being a question of patriotism and not of partyism.

During the extraordinary session repeated efforts were made by the minority side of the House to secure a consideration of this resolution, which is confessedly a very mild expression of public sentiment. But some strange spell had fallen upon the majority. Strong men who but one short year before had portrayed upon this floor in glowing colors the awful crimes committed in Cuba by the Spanish armies, and had vehemently advocated Cuban independence, now staggered at belligerency, urged moderation, and pleaded for more time to ascertain the true state of affairs in Cuba. For this purpose the President sent a trusted personal friend as his special agent to make an official investigation, promising, in a semiofficial way at least, that should the report of this gentleman corroborate the published statements of the horrible conditions in Cuba, the Administration would, without unnecessary delay, announce and enforce a vigorous policy, such as would meet the approval of Congress and the country.

The people remember that upon Mr. Calhoun's return he reported conditions even worse than had previously been described. Every man on this side of the Chamber and scores on that side were eager to vote for armed intervention and for Cuban independence. But some mysterious influence, potent until this hour, had fallen upon the Speaker of this House and upon his majority that forced them to turn a deaf ear to the entreaties of the minority, to the demands of the country, and to the piteous wails of starving victims of Spanish cruelty.

In the meantime the awful tragedy continued. Under Spanish authority our Chief Executive was maligned, our flag insulted, and American citizens in Cuba were despoiled of liberty and of life. And finally, as if to crown all their other infamies, the Spanish Government, under the guise of friendship, lured to its place of destruction the noble battle ship Maine, which, with 266 of as brave seamen as ever sailed under the Stars and Stripes, went to the bottom of the sea through Spanish treachery and diabolism.

The American people know that our ship and men were destroyed in Spanish waters; that the explosion was external; that the submarine mines and torpedoes belonged to Spain and were placed there under Spanish authority; that none but agents of the Spanish Government could have known the exact location of those engines of death, or the combinations by which they could be exploded. With these facts before them, I believe the American people will repudiate that portion of the President's message relating to the report of the court of inquiry on the Maine disaster in which he says:

I do not permit myself to doubt that the sense of justice of the Spanish nation will dictate a course of action suggested by honor and the friendly relations of the two governments.

I also believe they will repudiate the policy of the message delivered yesterday.

Mr. Chairman, the opinion held by the American people a year ago that this Government should at once accord belligerent rights to Cuba has grown into an unyielding conviction that had it done so then, thousands of Cubans now dead would be alive; that the country would now be on the road to a happy and prosperous condition; the battle ship Maine, the pride of the nation, with her gallant crew, would now be resting peacefully upon the bosom of the deep; the war clouds now pregnant with wrathful storm would long since have been dispersed and driven from the sky, and the honor of our flag would have been preserved in the eyes of our own citizens and of all the world. [Applause.]

The American people will brook no further delay in dealing with this question. They demand speedy and adequate reparation for the loss of our battle ship and its crew. They demand absolute freedom and independence for the Cuban people. They demand that a people who have poured out rivers of blood for independence and freedom shall neither be required nor permitted to pay in addition thereto a single dollar in cash, or in bond either, as an indemnity or as an annual tribute to the Spanish Government or to any mercenary bond syndicate on earth. That public servant who consents to any other kind of settlement of this question than the unconditional surrender of Cuba to those suffering patriots must settle with the American people at the polls. [Applause.]

In conclusion, permit me to say that on general principles I am opposed to war; but I am ready and eager to support any measure that may be proposed by the Administration looking to the immediate relief of the Cuban patriots and to a just indemnity for the loss of the Maine and her lamented crew. War is a deplorable method of settling national disputes, but we deal with a barbarous nation. I long for the incoming of that era, foretold by the old Hebrew prophet three thousand years ago, when the world's swords shall be beaten into plowshares and its spears into pruning hooks; when nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.

But the opening day of that glorious period has not yet dawned. The Prince of Peace has not yet established His kingdom in all human hearts. Nor will He, in my judgment, until this cruel nation shall have been blotted off the map. I do not believe a government can commit the crimes that Spain has committed in Cuba and escape just and awful retribution. If it is God's order that retributive justice shall be meted out to her through the instrumentality of this Government, I voice the universal sentiment of Kansas and of the country when I say, All hail the task! [Applause.]

Mr. JENKINS. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. GREENE].

[Mr. GREENE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I commenced the reading of a platform for the Republican party in 1900. [Applause and laughter.] There was a slight indisposition on the part of the House to the completion of the reading of that document. Indeed, it was ruled out of order. I could not understand why, for we had a naval appropriation bill under consideration, and my platform dealt with the great Republican ship. It went to the construction of the vessel. It took its history from the port in which it was originally launched clear through to its ultimate destination, and paid especial attention to the great master of the vessel itself. However, as I always bow to the rules of the House, I acquiesced in that decision, and am now prepared to present the few remaining planks of that platform. On that occasion I presented the following:

Mr. Chairman, it will be observed by every gentleman who does me the honor of listening to my remarks that the platform which I am about to present to be adopted by the Republican party at its convention in 1900 is an exact and accurate reflection of Republican sentiment, Republican thought, and Republican purpose, as evidenced by the Republican papers and by the gentlemen who represent that party upon this floor and elsewhere. This is the platform:

"In obedience to the instructions of those who dictate the policies and control the actions of the Republican party, we, their representatives and delegates in national convention assembled, renew our declared allegiance to their interests, our acquiescence in their wishes, and our eternal fidelity to their commands.

"We cordially indorse the Administration of our great leader, MARCUS AURELIUS HANNA, President de facto of the Republic, which has so sacredly kept faith with the trusts and corporations by generously reimbursing them with legislative and executive favors for the enormous sums so liberally and patriotically contributed by them to the Republican party in the campaign of 1896 to 'preserve the honor and integrity of the nation.'

"We specifically condemn the platform of the Republican national conventions of 1888 and 1892 in opposition to 'all combinations of capital organized in trusts or otherwise to control arbitrarily the condition of trade among our citizens.'

"We heartily commend the Republican national convention which met at St. Louis in 1896 in declining to condemn or criticise trusts, and we hereby declare it to be the present and future policy of the Republican party to foster and encourage trusts, to the end that further and greater contributions may be secured with which to enable us to 'purify the ballot' and 'preserve the honor and integrity of the nation.'

"The Republican party is unreservedly for 'sound money.' We said so in 1896, but most of us did not know what we meant by it then. But the bondholders, creditors, and bankers, who know all about the science of money, have told us that we meant the gold standard, greenback retirement, and bank issue and control of paper money. We therefore, recognizing their intellectual and moral superiority, declare our complete and abiding confidence in their wisdom and unselfish patriotism, and cheerfully obey their orders, announce our perpetual loyalty to the plan of the Secretary of the Treasury to 'commit the country more thoroughly to the gold standard,' retire the greenbacks and Treasury notes, and give to the banks the exclusive right to issue or refuse to issue paper money to enable the people to transact their business; and we further solemnly declare that any man who dares question the infallibility or perfection of this financial policy is an 'anarchist,' a 'repudiationist,' and personally 'dishonest' and 'corrupt.'

"In unmeasured terms we express our utter detestation and disgust with the Republican national conventions of 1888 and 1892 for the 'wild-eyed,' 'long-haired,' 'anarchistic,' 'Populistic,' 'socialistic,' 'communistic' language contained therein, as follows:

"'The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver.'—Platform 1888.

"'The American people from tradition and interest favor bimetallism, and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money, with such restrictions and under such provisions, to be determined by legislation, as will secure the maintenance of the parity of values of the two metals, so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether of silver, gold, or paper, shall be at all times equal.'—Platform 1892.

"We would use harsher language in denouncing this blatant nonsense of these two Republican conventions were it not that one William McKinley, who is supposed by some ill-informed people to be President of the United States, was chairman of the platform committee of the convention of 1888 and permanent chairman of the convention of 1892, and we do not desire to seriously embarrass him. We further declare that the Republican party has not changed its platform or faith on the financial question, and anybody that says that it has is a 'liar,' a 'footpad,' and a 'border ruffian.'

"With our faces turned toward Wall street, from whence all blessings flow, for support and sustenance, we solemnly declare that when the Republican convention at Minneapolis asserted that 'the American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetallism, and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money,' it meant to declare unequivocally for gold alone as 'standard money,' and any man who does not understand it that way is a 'lunatic and ought to be confined in an asylum.'

"We indorse the lofty and patriotic sentiment expressed so eloquently by our distinguished ally, Hon. John M. Palmer, in the campaign of 1896, to the effect that he would rather live in a monarchy than in a republic where the principles of the Chicago platform prevailed."

I will now complete the reading of that platform:

Following the instructions of those who dictate our policies, control our conventions, and manage our Administration, we bow in worshipful adoration at the feet of Grover the Fat—him who gave us wisdom and an honest financial policy, conservatism, and our foreign policy; who taught us the patriotic and unselfish lesson that the rights of property are more sacred than the rights of men; that "money" ought to be "the master; everything else the servant." As an official evidence of our profound reverence for him, we shall write his name on the roll of honor of our party, second only to our other sainted hero, MARCUS AURELIUS HANNA.

[Laughter on the Democratic side.]

We view with serious apprehension the growing disposition of the American people to investigate public questions for themselves. We believe that every true and loyal Republican will confidingly leave to our wise, prudent, and magnanimous master, the de facto President, and his philanthropic coadjutors, who furnish the party both its money and its money policy, the entire solution of all problems of State. It is our solemn conviction that the people of the United States have not sufficient intelligence to understand the science of money, and in view of the fact that the great bankers, bondholders, and gold brokers of the world have generously, considerately, and patriotically offered to come to our rescue and manage the finances of the Government, and issue or refuse to issue money with which to conduct the business of our citizens, as in their judgment is advisable, we therefore recommend that their offer be accepted, and that the heartfelt thanks of the American people be extended to them as the saviors "of the nation's honor."

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The propagation of ideas antagonistic to a constantly appreciating money standard, or any investigation which questions the infallibility of the gold standard by professors of economics in our educational institutions is greatly to be deplored.

Every such professor should be given to understand that his salary is dependent upon his teaching the doctrine of the gold standard, "the standard of the most enlightened nations of the earth."

Such professors should be ordered to inculcate into the minds of their pupils the idea that an "honest dollar is a dollar of the highest purchasing power," a "dear dollar," and that a "dear" dollar means low prices for everything measured by or exchanged against that dollar, and that by receiving low prices for what he has to sell the debtor may more easily discharge his debt and the producer of wealth receive more for his products.

These professors must thoroughly understand that men of fabulous wealth who liberally endow our colleges and universities claim and have the right to have taught within their walls the policies and systems through which they acquired their great riches.

The Republican party is in favor of "dear" dollars and plenty of them. "Scarce" dollars are "dear" dollars. Therefore we are unreservedly in favor of "scarce" dollars and plenty of them.

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The Republican party, under the direction of its great commander, while declaring its undying devotion to the personal liberty of the citizen and its determination to accord to the "common people" all rights and privileges with which they may be safely intrusted, hereby announces as a fundamental tenet of its faith that no new States shall be admitted into the Union, except upon the express condition inserted in the act of admission that their Senators and Representatives to the National Congress shall, in addition to the usual oath, "solemnly swear to support the gold standard, greenback retirement, bank issue and control of paper money, all legislation favorable to corporations and trusts, and to vote upon such other measures for the 'preservation of the honor and integrity of the nation' as may come before Congress in the manner directed by our great and good master, MARCUS AURELIUS HANNA, his successors and assigns."

[Laughter on the Democratic side.]

While our great and good commander graciously informs us that we were sorely shocked and grieved at the barbarities perpetrated by the Spanish soldires against the Cuban patriots in their struggle for liberty, resulting in the butchery or starvation of hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children, yet he gives us the comforting assurance by way of complete exoneration of his Administration for permitting the long continuance of these atrocities, that the victims were nearly all from the poorer classes, and it is doubted if this depletion of their ranks is seriously to be regretted.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Our affectionate master further comforts us with the knowledge that by refraining from prohibiting the slaughter and starvation of these thousands of poverty-stricken wretches he preserved from a severe shock the refined and tender sensibilities of the very best and noblest class of the citizens of the world—the holders of the Spanish bonds.

When we contemplate the serious injury which would be sustained by them in the depreciation of their bonds as the result of intervention, our very souls revolt and we count as naught the destruction of a few hundred thousand lives of penniless wretches and the perpetual enslavement of those who survive.

We therefore congratulate our greatly cherished commander upon the wise, generous, and humane policy applied to the Cuban troubles, which found its warrant in the sacred motto of the party, "Money the master; everything else the servant."

The gathered wisdom of the ages having found secure lodgment in the sacred skulls of our dearly beloved leader and his self-anointed cosaviors "of the country's honor," they have discovered and, through us their humble and obedient servants, now announce to the world the important scientific truth that in their deliberate, enlightened, refined, and lofty judgment there are too many people in the world, especially too many poor people.

Mr. LENTZ. An overproduction.

Mr. HARTMAN (reading)—

While this new application of the theory of overproduction to population is not fully understood by the common people, it has stood the test of some of the gigantic intellects of our economists that have been especially employed and liberally paid to teach the doctrine of the gold standard, and we therefore confidently incorporate it in this platform with the following axiomatic utterances of the party:

1. The overproduction of wealth causes poverty.

2. The reason there is hunger and starvation among the people is that there is too much food produced for them to eat.

3. Men, women, and children are naked and ragged because there are too many clothes for them to wear.

4. The extraordinarily large production of coal and other fuel is the cause of so many people suffering from the biting cold of winter. If there were less produced, everybody would have more to burn.

[Laughter on the Democratic side.]

5. The overproduction of people is responsible for the decreased demand for all things used or consumed by man.

We extend our sincere congratulations to William McKinley for his successful deception of the American people, by promising in his letter of acceptance to "keep in circulation and as good as gold all the silver and paper money which are now included in the currency of the country."

The making of this promise by Candidate McKinley undoubtedly was justified by the exigencies of the occasion, for without it and other cunning, deceptive devices and the liberal and judicious expenditure of vast sums of money to "purify the ballot" and "elevate American manhood," the American people would have indorsed the "dishonest," "anarchistic," "communistic," "socialistic," "Populistic," "un-American," "unpatriotic," "revolutionary," and "unholy" Chicago platform, the principles of which, if adopted, would wrest this Government from the control of our great and good master, MARCUS AURELIUS HANNA, and his fellow-guardians of the "nation's honor," and transfer that power to the common people, who are utterly unfit to be trusted with the grave responsibilities of self-government.

We therefore commend in unqualified terms the making of that promise by Mr. McKinley, and we solemnly declare that the deliberate violation of that promise by the man who made it and our unqualified approval of such violation is complete and irrefutable proof—

First. Of the immaculate integrity of the Republican party; and Second. That the 6,500,000 citizens who voted against Mr. McKinley at the election of 1896 are, as we have often declared before, "anarchists," "repudiationists," "communists," "socialists," "Populists," "agitators," "demagogues," "idiots," "lunatics," "addle-pated fools," "border ruffians," and "common blackguards."

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

To the end that perfect propriety and consistency may be maintained, we recommend that the votes of William McKinley in favor of bimetallism, when he was a member of the House of Representatives, and his numerous speeches in support thereof, be obliterated from the public records, and that any citizen of the Republic who hereafter reads, recites, or prints any speech or speeches of the aforesaid McKinley favoring bimetallism shall be banished from the realm.

[Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Realizing as we do that in the earlier history of our party the men who shaped, molded, and declared its opinions were usually rough, uncouth, undignified, illiterate, and unrefined we charitably overlook many of their blunders. Could they have had the benefit of association with the superior refinement, intelligence, and patriotism of Wall street and Lombard street, which now dictate the policies of the Republican party, we are confident that no wild-eyed and ridiculous declarations adverse to the gold standard would have found a place in any platform of that party. But while we can excuse some of their blunders, we believe it to be our duty as the self-constituted guardians of the "honor and integrity of the nation" to specifically repudiate and denounce as "anarchistic," as "un-American," as "unpatriotic," and as "destructive of the confidence in the Government" of the men who possess all the wealth, and consequently all the wisdom of the country, the plank in the Republican platform of 1860 against unwarranted Federal interference with State affairs, and the other plank which vulgarly referred to a decision of the Supreme Court as a "perversion of judicial power."

We find similar sentiments to these in the Chicago platform of 1896 and we unhesitatingly assert that no law-abiding, patriotic citizen can be found in the limits or history of the Republic, so lost to all sense of propriety as to indorse these "un-American" and "revolutionary sentiments." If we could think that Abraham Lincoln, who was elected President upon the platform containing these planks, and who specifically indorsed them in his message to Congress, understood their meaning, we would feel it our solemn duty in pursuance of our decision to regulate the morals, the money, and the men of the country, to condemn him; but he was only a "backwoods statesman," and did not know any better.

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

He had not had the advantage of associations with the superior intelligence, integrity, and patriotism which have controlled the Republican party since 1896, and out of consideration for the fact that there is still some sentiment in the country of a lingering respect for his name we will omit a specific denunciation of him and confine ourselves to branding as "anarchistic," "unpatriotic," "treasonable," and as the vaporings of a diseased mind his public utterances which follow:

* * * "And more than this, they placed in the platform for my acceptance, and as a law to themselves and to me, the clear and emphatic resolution which I now read:

"'Resolved, That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend; and we denounce the lawless invasion, by armed force, of the soil of any State or Territory, no matter under what pretext, as among the gravest of crimes.'

"I now reiterate these sentiments, and in doing so I only press upon the public attention the most conclusive evidence of which the case is susceptible that the property, peace, and security of no section are to be in anywise endangered by the now incoming Administration. I add, too, that all the protection which, consistently with the Constitution and the laws, can be given will be cheerfully given to all the States when lawfully demanded, for whatever cause, as cheerfully to one section as to another.

"If a government contracts a debt with a certain amount of money in circulation, and then contracts the volume before the debt is paid, it is the most heinous crime that a government can commit against the people.

"In my present position I could scarcely be justified were I to omit raising a warning voice against this approach of returning despotism.

"It is not needed nor fitting here that a general argument should be made in favor of popular institutions, but there is one point, with its connections, not so hackneyed as most others, to which I ask a brief attention. It is the effort to place capital on an equal footing with, if not above, labor in the structure of government. It is assumed that labor is available only in connection with capital; that nobody labors unless somebody else owning capital somehow by the use of it induces him to labor. This assumed, it is next considered whether it is best that capital shall hire laborers, and thus induce them to work by their own consent, or buy them and drive them to it without their consent. Having proceeded so far, it is naturally concluded that all laborers are either hired laborers or what we call slaves. And further, it is assumed that whoever is once a hired laborer is fixed in that condition for life.

"Now, there is no such relation between capital and labor as assumed, nor is there any such thing as a freeman being fixed for life in the condition of a hired laborer. Both these assumptions are false and all inferences from them are groundless.

"Labor is prior to and independent of capital. Capital is only the fruit of labor, and could never have existed if labor had not first existed. Labor is the superior of capital, and deserves much the higher consideration.

"No men living are more worthy to be trusted than those who toil up from poverty; none less inclined to take or touch aught which they have not honestly earned. Let them beware of surrendering a political power which they already possess, and which if surrendered will surely be used to close the door of advancement against such as they and to fix new disabilities and burdens upon them till all of liberty shall be lost."—Message, December 3, 1861.

However, the Republican party, in pursuance of its purpose to stamp out all such anarchistic utterances as were pronounced and indorsed by Mr. Lincoln, here and now declares that no American citizen has the right to criticise, question, or attempt to have revised, by motion for a rehearing or otherwise, any decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and any citizen who attempts to criticise or discuss the infallibility of the Supreme Court decisions will be branded by the gold-standard press of the country, which is under the command of the Republican party, as an anarchist, as a footpad, as a socialist, as a communist, as a robber, and as an enemy of his country; and if this does not cause him to desist, then we will invoke the power of the courts to enjoin him.

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

We declare as our deliberate judgment that no honest, peaceful, patriotic, law-abiding citizen of the Republic will ever criticise or question the righteousness of a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

It is with feelings akin to horror that we read the monstrous Populistic doctrine announced by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Trans-Missouri Traffic Association cases. How it can be possible that men so feeble intellectually and so degraded morally could find their way upon the Supreme Bench, there to tamper with and strike down the sacred rights of property, is a proposition almost beyond our stupendous comprehension. Had this decision been rendered by a lot of blear-eyed Populists or addle-pated silver lunatics, we should not have been surprised; but, coming from the Supreme Court of the United States, there was no justification for it, and we denounce it and the court that rendered it in unmeasured terms.

We express our entire confidence in and our satisfaction with the great tariff bill of the Republican party, known as the Dingley bill. Through its far-reaching effects, amplified by the efficient aid of the gold standard, the crops of India, Argentina, Switzerland, and France were blighted.

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Eight million of the ignorant inhabitants of India died from starvation, and as a result of this beneficent legislation the American farmer obtained nearly one-half as much for his crop as he would have received under the bimetallic system.

[Laughter on the Democratic side.]

The mysterious but far-reaching effects of this bill were felt in Australia two years before the bill was passed.

[Laughter.]

The very anticipation of its passage caused a drought in the years 1895 and 1896, and as a result thereof 34,000,000 sheep died or were slaughtered because of the shortage of food, which shortage was directly traceable to the anticipated passage of the Dingley bill. Thirty-four million sheep and the wool sheared from them in Australia taken out of the competitive markets of the world, the American sheep grower received a higher price for his product than at any time since the Republican party helped Grover Cleveland repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman law and bring prosperity to the land. We therefore confidently claim that the Dingley bill and the gold standard are wholly responsible for the increase in the price of wheat and for the increase in the price of wool.

We are not sure that we are entirely gratified at the rise in price of these two articles, for we solemnly promised the American wage-earner that by the election of McKinley and under the gold standard the price of these articles would come down, so that he could buy more of them with the wages paid him for his day's labor. In view of the fact, however, that we also promised the farmers of the United States that the election of McKinley and the gold standard would make the men who bought their products have to pay a higher price for them, we here and now declare our gratification at the rise in the price of wheat and wool caused by the Dingley bill and the gold standard, and respectfully request that this plank in the platform shall not be read by the wage-earners of the country.

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.].

We specifically disavow and disclaim all party responsibility for the following utterances made by the gentleman who now draws the salary of the Chief Executive of this nation. We do this for the reason that in our solemn, enlightened, patriotic, and sanctified judgment the sentiments therein contained are "anarchistic," "populistic," "socialistic," "communistic," and destructive of the peace of mind of the possessors of wealth, and consequently directly antagonistic to the highest, noblest, and most patriotic class of our citizens. The following is the language condemned. Speaking of Cleveland's policy, Mr. McKinley said:

"During all of his years at the head of the Government he was dishonoring one of our precious metals, one of our own great products, discrediting silver and enhancing the price of gold. He endeavored, even before his inauguration to office, to stop the coinage of silver dollars, and afterwards, and to the end of his Administration, persistently used his power to that end. He was determined to contract the circulating medium and demonetize one of the coins of commerce, limit the volume of money among the people, make money scarce, and therefore dear. He would have increased the value of money and diminished the value of everything else—money the master, everything else the servant. He was not thinking of the 'poor' then. He had left 'their side.' He was not 'standing forth in their defense.' Cheap coats, cheap labor, and dear money; the sponsor and promoter of these professing to stand guard over the poor and lowly. Was there ever more glaring inconsistency or reckless assumption? He believes that poverty is a blessing to be promoted and encouraged, and that a shrinkage in the value of everything but money is a national benediction."—Speech of William McKinley, Akron, Ohio, 1891.

It is our deliberate judgment, based upon the opinion of our legal advisers, who have been amply recompensed for their services, that the only constitutional and lawful standard of value is gold; that any attempt to displace that standard and establish a new one is an act of treason to the State, a violation of the sacred honor of the country, and an act of gross repudiation. We recognize that it is true that some irresponsible and unpatriotic citizens in times past have expressed opinions contrary to this. But we know the value of the opinion that we have announced, for our master has bought it and paid for it, and there is but one test of merit in the crucible of our faith—What is the price?

In 1836, one Daniel Webster, a poor poverty-stricken wretch who achieved some little notoriety in the country, gave utterance to this language:

"I am clearly of the opinion that gold and silver, at rates fixed by Congress, constitute the legal standard of value in this country, and that neither Congress nor any State has authority to establish any other standard or to displace this standard."

Everyone who is familiar with the history of Daniel Webster knows that he had no money, and therefore his opinion upon this question is of no value, and any man who quotes it with respect or reverence is a lunatic and a gibbering idiot.

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

It is with great regret that we, the Republican party, in this year 1900, in national convention assembled, are called upon to purge the pages of history of so many unpatriotic and senseless utterances of men who at one time stood high in the councils of our party; but solemn duty demands heroic action, and we here and now denounce the following language from the lips of James G. Blaine in 1878, as the irresponsible driveling of an imbecile:

"I believe gold and silver coin to be the money of the Constitution. No power was conferred on Congress to declare either metal should not be money. Congress has, in my judgment, no power to demonetize silver any more than to demonetize gold."

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

"I believe the struggle now going on in this country and in other countries for a single gold standard would, if successful, produce disaster in and throughout the commercial world. The destruction of silver as money and the establishment of gold as the sole unit of value must have a ruinous effect on all forms of property except those investments which yield a fixed return in money. These would be enormously enhanced in value, and would gain a disproportionate and therefore unfair advantage over every other species of property. If, as the most reliable statistics affirm, there are nearly seven thousand millions of coin or bullion in the world not very unequally divided between gold and silver, it is impossible to strike silver out of existence as money without results which will prove distressing to millions and utterly disastrous to tens of thousands." (United States Senate, February 7, 1878.)

And we recommend to the Republicans of the United States the obliteration of Mr. Blaine's name from the roll of honor of our party and the substitution in lieu thereof of "our right trusty and well-beloved counselor," John G. Carlisle, who recanted all previous utterances of a similar character, and now, under the inspiration of a liberal salary, is one of our saints, solemnly pledged "to maintain the honor and integrity of the nation."

It was our determined purpose in announcing this code of high principles for the Republican party to specifically repudiate and condemn by name all Republicans who in the past have expressed their opposition to the present policies of the Republican party, which are intended to perpetually maintain the gold standard, favor greenback retirement and bank issue and control of all paper money used by the people, and to foster and sustain trusts. But the task was greater than we anticipated.

We found that their name was legion, and that to carry out that purpose would have involved most of the illustrious names of the party's past history and many of the present. We therefore content ourselves with implicit obedience to the orders of our master and denounce as "un-American," "un-Republican," "unpatriotic," "anarchistic," "populistic," "dishonest," "treasonable to the state," and as a "direct assault upon the national honor" every speech and vote ever uttered or cast by every misguided member of the Republican party against the gold standard or antagonistic to the interests of trusts.

We offer unstinted praise to the managers of the Republican party in the House of Registers of the Fifty-fifth Congress for their active and efficient opposition to the free-home bill specifically indorsed by the Republican national platform of 1896. The repudiation of the party pledges in this regard were both timely and highly honorable, for the probable rapid growth and development of the Western States through the further extension of the free-home policy carries with it a serious menace to the purposes of the Republican party by giving greater power to those sections of the Union so aptly and appropriately designated by Grover Cleveland, the great financial oracle of our party, as "corrupt municipalities" and "undesirable States."

We congratulate our able and cunning master upon the skill with which he has kept our opponents divided. We applaud his wisdom in so artfully expending money as to induce our opponents to slay their leaders one by one as they come to prominence in the ranks of bimetallism, and we laud his determination to keep Democrats, Populists, and Silver Republicans apart so long as there is one man in their ranks who through fear, favor, or avarice can be induced to give the "Judas kiss." And we hail as his best servants those Democrats, Populists, or Silver Republicans who have aided in achieving his highest and holiest purposes by refusing to unite the overwhelming ranks of the opposition against us. We can always defeat the people so long as we can keep the people divided. Let our motto be, "Our disunited opponents are their own executioners."

We extend our heartfelt congratulations to Edward Lauterbach, chairman of the Republican committee of New York, for the patriotic sentiments expressed by him in the campaign of 1896 in the following language:

"You are fighting to-day for just as important a principle as did those brave men in 1861. But it is a bloodless fight. No blood will be shed, at least, not yet; but if they attempt to subvert your Supreme Court, if they should succeed by any chance in foisting upon you those horrible doctrines—anarchistic, socialistic, and communistic—which that platform adopted by this Populistic brood contains, we may not abide by that decision."

These inspired words uttered by the distinguished representative of the gold standard and trusts clearly indicate the right of those who advocate the sacred tenets of our faith to refuse to abide by the rule of the majority when such rule is against them, and this sentiment meets with the unqualified approval of our master.

We commend to the youth of the land, as an example worthy of their emulation, the public character and record of our beloved and honored ruler, MARCUS AURELIUS HANNA. We point with pride and gratification to the generous and unstinted expenditure of the campaign funds patriotically and religiously donated by the eleemosynary and charitable institutions of the country, commonly known as trusts, combinations, and other forms of aggregated wealth. We congratulate the servants of the party that they have so righteous and generous a master.

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

We unhesitatingly approve the practice so generally employed in the campaign of 1896 to deprive the wage-earners of the country of the right to exercise a free and untrammeled ballot by having notice served upon them that if Mr. McKinley were elected they could come back to work, but that if Mr. Bryan were elected they need not return. We indorse this practice for two reasons: First, we presume that it is in compliance with the oft-repeated declaration of our party that every man should have the right "to cast one free and unrestricted ballot;" second, we know that the wage-earners of the country have not sufficient knowledge to vote intelligently, and in order to keep them from destroying themselves, and at the same time "to preserve the honor and integrity of the nation," we cordially, heartily, and sincerely approve of the practice of intimidation above mentioned in the past and recommend its repetition in the future.

The great heart of the Republican party was made to throb with gratification and with unalloyed joy when it was learned throughout the length and breadth of the land that the national committee, under the management of our most excellent master, were notifying farmers upon whose lands mortgages rested that would soon come due, that if Mr. McKinley were elected their mortgages would be extended, but that if Mr. Bryan should be elected they would be foreclosed. This plan, which operated so effectively to prevent many farmers from voting their own honest convictions, meets with our unqualified approval. It presented to the farmers of the country an argument which it was difficult to withstand.

The agents of the trust companies, who were the emissaries of the national committee, were imbued with the high purpose of guaranteeing to every farmer upon whose place the trust companies held a mortgage the right to vote as he pleased, provided he was pleased to vote as he was told to vote. Otherwise they assured him in the kindest and most Christian spirit that he could only remain on his farm until the mortgage became due.

We indorse this broad, liberal, patriotic, and generous policy toward the mortgaged farmers of the United States, which policy was prompted by the most generous and most virtuous impulses of the human heart, and we recommend a further extension of this highly moral and philanthropic practice in future campaigns.

The experience of the Republican party in the campaign of 1896 and subsequent thereto has demonstrated the wisdom and necessity of placing all power of the party under the supreme control and domination of one strong, pure-minded, and patriotic man. The lodgment of all party power in the person of our dearly beloved master, MARCUS AURELIUS HANNA, was at once an act of childlike confiding simplicity and at the same time an exhibition of the highest order of intellectual and patriotic discrimination. Surrounded at all times as he is by the representatives of the great trusts, the great railroads, and the great banks, and by the agents of the Rothschilds, he at all times has the advantage of the highest order of intelligence, patriotism, morality, and Christian citizenship, which can only be held by the possessors or representatives of great money or property interests. We therefore congratulate the millions of servants of the Republican party that they have transferred their individual sovereignty to the exclusive control of this great and good man.

Our all-wise and all-powerful ruler, MARCUS AURELIUS HANNA, has graciously permitted us to say to the servants of the party that he still retains the most affectionate regard for them, and that he will use his utmost endeavor to again touch the philanthropic hearts of the chiefs of the money centers of the world in the coming campaign to enable him to procure the necessary quantity of noble patriotism for distribution among the people and to assist him in carrying out the work to which his whole life is pledged—of purifying the ballot and rendering sacred the right of American suffrage. Our great master, in furtherance of these highly moral purposes, assures his servants that the fund of $18,000,000 at his command in 1896 was all that was needed to defray the legitimate expenses of the campaign of education which he waged, and by the judicious expenditure of which he was enabled to "cleanse the morals of the people," "preserve the ballot from pollution," "prevent the corrupt use of money," and otherwise sanctify the cause of an honest dollar.

Our good master has instructed us to send special greeting to those Senators and Representatives of the United States Congress, and to leaders of thought in the Middle and Western States, who have reposed implicit confidence in the party under its present management. He desires us to extend to them his sincere thanks for their unselfish fidelity to the interests of himself and his coadjutors, who are the beneficiaries of the policies of the party.

He recognizes that the allegiance of many Senators and Representatives who have in the past been supporters of bimetallism can only be maintained by their surrender of convictions and principles heretofore dearly cherished and openly proclaimed to their constituents; and he instructs us to assure them of his high appreciation of their heroic devotion to the interests of the trusts and the beneficiaries of the gold standard so cheerfully rendered by them at the expense of the willful violation of the pledges made to the people who sent them to Washington and whose sworn representatives they are supposed to be.

He directs this convention to convey to them his profound approbation of this willful deception of their constituents and to assure them that in his code of morals no act of loftier purpose or more sterling integrity can be found. It is our further inestimable pleasure to assure all such loyal and faithful servants of the gold standard that liberal donations will be cheerfully made from the funds subscribed by the trusts and corporations to secure their retention in public office by the usual "business methods" employed by our sainted leader in his earnest efforts to "purify the ballot" and "preserve the honor and integrity of the nation."

As one startling and convincing proof of the beneficial effects of our sacred gold standard we point with gratification and pride to the fact that it "has enabled 250,000 people to accumulate 80 per cent of all the wealth of the United States, leaving 20 per cent to be divided between 71,750,000 people."

These results indicate conclusively to any fair-minded citizen the wisdom of the existence of the gold standard and the necessity for its continuance. Its original invention and adoption, if not indeed of divine origin, was certainly in response to that inexorable decree of fate that the many should toil while the few reap the rewards of their efforts. This is as it should be. The blatant and demagogical declaration adopted by the illiterate and uncouth body of men who in 1776 declared that "all men are created equal" has long since been abandoned by the higher classes of our citizenship, and we now obediently acquiesce in the inevitable trend of civilization toward the permanent establishment of the rule of the gold standard and trusts, whereby the common people who are engaged in the vulgar vocation of producing wealth shall understand that the fruits of their labor rightfully belong to the money-eyed classes, who are entirely competent to absorb the products of toil and to govern and control the producers of wealth.

The time has come when the great master of the Republican party deems it wise to take his servants into his confidence as to the methods which he will employ in all future campaigns. Henceforth, as in the campaign of 1896 and subsequent one, the unvarying policy of the party shall be, first, to persuade the citizen to support the party. If he refuse to do that, then, second, by all the power of intimidation and coercion so successfully employed in the campaign of 1896 and those which followed it, compel him to support it. If that fail, then, third, to buy him. If that fail, then, fourth, destroy him socially, politically, and financially.

With so simple and effective a rule publicly proclaimed, it is the opinion of our master that the reason, conscience, and patriotism of the citizens will become immediately responsive to the desires of the beneficiaries of trusts and the gold standard, and a great victory for a "free," "unrestricted," and "pure" ballot will have been achieved by our consecrated leader in his relentless efforts to "cleanse the morals of the people," "defend the right of American manhood," "assert the personal freedom of the citizen," and "preserve the honor and integrity of the nation."

The successful achievements which have been attained by the concentration of all party power into the sacred care and keeping of our beloved master justifies us in recommending to the serious consideration of the American people the proposition to surrender the form of republican government adopted in 1789. The fact that the spirit and substance of that Government has been gradually surrendered with such beneficial results to the American people, and particularly to the great moneyed interests and creditor classes, leaves no longer any reason for retaining the empty form.

When our generous master modestly suggested in his telegram of January, 1898, that "God reigns and the Republican party still lives," he but gave utterance to the slumbering but unexpressed opinion in the hearts and minds of the millions of servants of the Republican party, that he alone possessed the wisdom, the power, and the patriotism of that organization. Recognizing this as a self-evident truth and desiring to perpetuate the blessings of his rule, not only for ourselves, but for generations yet unborn, it is our fond hope that at no distant day the farce of republican form of government shall be adandoned, the house of HANNA be established, the rule of royalty inaugurated, and the eternal fitness of things accomplished. When that time comes, the present servants of the Republican party will become the willing slaves of the new monarchy, gladly hailing our great master as their benefactor and openly responding to the duties of loyal subjects by doing appropriate obeisance to MARCUS THE FIRST, and by adopting as the watchwords of their liberties, "Long live the king!"

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I want to see if it is not possible to agree upon a time to take a vote on this bill. I want to ask unanimous consent that debate be closed at a quarter to 5, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. HANDY] and the other half by the District Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that debate close at a quarter to 5 o'clock, one half of the time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Delaware. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. HANDY. One moment. There is a misunderstanding. Did the gentleman ask that debate be closed at a quarter to 5 o'clock? Make it 5 o'clock. It is impossible to——

Mr. JENKINS. They will extend the time.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I always listen with a great deal of pleasure to my young friend from Montana. I listened with much greater delight to him three years ago when he was warming the cockles of the hearts of the Republicans, and when he was especially talking to our Populist brethren.

Now, for the benefit of my Populist friends, let me just in a nutshell add a line to the speech which he has just made, and I will quote it substantially from his own speech of three years ago. He said then that out in Montana the Populists were very progressive men. That it was proposed seriously by one shining light of the party to cross the centiped with the Berkshire hog in order that each hog should have a hundred hams. That, he said, was part of the Populist plan to create wealth in Montana. Then he said, further, that they made a further proposition——

Mr. SIMPSON. It was when he was a Republican that he said that.

Mr. LACEY. I can not be interrupted.

Mr. HARTMAN. I shall desire to reply.

Mr. LACEY. He also called attention to the fact that the Populists out in Montana were about to cross the honeybee on the lightning bug, so that they could work at night [laughter]; and he then described the magnificent proposition of another Populist there, who was crossing the milkweed with the strawberry, so as to have strawberries and cream upon the same plant. [Renewed laughter.] Now, I only bring out this little interesting reminiscence in order that my friend might, right in this connection, print it in the RECORD for the general delectation of his Populist constituents in Montana. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, I suppose I am entitled to reply. I only ask for three minutes.

Mr. HANDY. I yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa has called attention to some remarks submitted by me on the 13th day of February, 1896, in the Fifty-fourth Congress. I am grateful to the gentleman for calling my attention to this language in the connection which he does. At this point in my reply to the gentleman I shall print the few lines referred to by him, which were uttered by me at that time. They are as follows:

It is true that the Populist party has had a number of different remedies for the situation, and I am advised that they are about to add three additional planks to their platform. One of them is to make a cross between the lightning bug and the honeybee for the purpose of enabling the bee to work at night. Another one is that of breeding the centiped with the hog for the purpose of having a hundred hams for each animal. And I am also told that they have the further visionary scheme of budding strawberry plants into milkweeds, so that everybody can have strawberries and cream from the same plant.

It is true that at the time and place stated by the gentleman from Iowa the foregoing words were uttered by myself. It may not be uninteresting to the House for me to detail something of the history of that statement. I had been advised that a distinguished citizen of Ohio, at that time a member of the Populist party, Gen. Jacob S. Coxey, had in contemplation the proposal of these planks to the national convention of that party which was to assemble, and did afterwards assemble, in the city of St. Louis. The subsequent history of that convention shows that not only did the convention not adopt this extraordinary code of principles, but instead of such action it promulgated and gave to the country a platform of principles which challenges the admiration of American manhood everywhere.

But the undaunted advocate of these ideas, if indeed he were their advocate, lost no heart in his crusade, but turned his attention in other directions. He was seeking new worlds to conquer. He found the Populist party too conservative to even consider the fantastical ideas which were the subject of my remarks in the Fifty-fourth Congress. He therefore cast about to find some party so utterly devoid of reason as to be willing to accept his theories and their promoter. With an intellectual acumen that none had before accorded to him, he turned to reading the record of the Republican party since 1896, with a view to forming a natural and logical alliance with it. He learned that the Republican party was attempting to make bimetallic posies and gold-standard flowers bloom from the same plant, and he knew of no reason why he could not with equal consistency raise strawberries and cream from the milkweed. [Laughter.]

He discovered that much of the work of the Republican party in the last campaign had been done under the cover of darkness. He naturally thought that there should be thrown on those transactions a little light, and so he thought they ought to have some use for the lightning bug. He ascertained that the Republican party were announcing to the American people that the reason there was so much hunger in the country was that there was too much food with which to feed the starving, and he therefore thought that they would, in pursuance of their ridiculous inconsistency, naturally take to the proposition of breeding the centiped to the hog, with a view to raising a hundred hams to each animal. [Great laughter.] And he was not mistaken.

Moved by these desires, he naturally and logically entered into negotiations with the great master of the Republican party along the line of "business methods" which were so effective in certain portions of the United States in the campaigns of 1896 and 1897. The terms of those negotiations will never be known except to General Coxey and that pure and holy patriot who dispensed the campaign fund of the Republican party in 1896 in the interest of honest elections and to "preserve the honor and integrity of the nation."

The results, however, were apparent to everyone who saw or learned of that great but recent acquisition to the Republican ranks rolling through the State of Ohio in a private car in the interest of the Republican party and for the purpose of dividing the opposition to the election of Mr. HANNA and further perpetuating the policies of the Republican party, and was the final chapter of this brief history, giving the Republican party the honor and making it the possessor of the original inventor of the three great ideas of Coxeyism.

This transfer carried with it the exclusive right to the use of the scheme itself, and therefore MARK HANNA not only became the owner and possessor, for value received, of General Coxey, but also acquired the right to the use of the idea of breeding the honey bee with the lightning bug, so that they could both work at night, and budding of the strawberry plant into the milkweed, so that the Republican party could have strawberries and cream the rest of their days. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Does the gentleman from Iowa wish any time to reply?

Mr. LACEY. No, Mr. Chairman, unless there is some other plan of miscegenation to be suggested on the other side. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, what is the matter under consideration by the committee?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DALZELL in the chair). It is Senate bill 934, an act to authorize the Washington and Glen Echo Railway Company to extend its tracks into the District of Columbia.

Mr. MAHON. I think, Mr. Chairman, the bill ought to be read for the information of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is under obligation to recognize the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to know if my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] desires some time, and if he has any particular object, I would be glad to make an apportionment of the time yielded to me.

Mr. MAHON. No; I asked what was before the House. I wanted to know upon what subject the gentleman was going to speak.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. It is not my purpose to address myself to this bill.

Mr. HANDY. General debate is in order, and I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

[Mr. LEWIS of Washington addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DALZELL in the chair). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I ask consent that I may be permitted to proceed for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time, as the Chair understands it, is limited.

Mr. HANDY. The time on this side of the House is already disposed of. I should be very glad to give the gentleman the time if I had the privilege of doing so.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. HANDY. That would come out of the time of the other side of the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does that extend the time for adjournment?

Mr. BABCOCK. It would necessarily extend the time, for an agreement has been made when the vote shall be taken on this bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. The time is fixed for the vote at a quarter before 5?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. My time was taken up by my friend from Iowa to some extent, but was promised back again. I hope I will have the extension.

Mr. LACEY. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

Mr. HANDY. I am unable personally to yield further time to the gentleman myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. May I be pardoned, then, Mr. Chairman, at this time, to ask to be permitted to extend my remarks, along this line, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, because of the fact that there is a disinclination to an extension of time?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I should feel great hesitation at any time to inject a purely academic discussion into the proceedings of this House, but I have before me the announcement that the compaign of education is to be begun by the late Mr. Bryan in my State this week, and I feel that I should like to anticipate it by a day or two. I propose to take the time of the House in a discussion of the gold standard and its effect upon money and wages.

GOLD THE NATURAL STANDARD.

The oldest financial transaction of which I can find any account is recorded in the sixteenth verse of the twenty-third chapter of Genesis, where we are told that, nearly four thousand years ago, Abraham, in buying a burial place, weighed to Ephron in payment "400 shekels of silver, current money with the merchant."

Abraham was a stranger and a sojourner in that land and paid his debt in a money of commerce, an actual weight of silver bullion, for it was a thousand years before governments had learned to coin money or fix by law ratios between silver and gold.

But the Bible throws a curious side light upon this transaction, showing that human nature was the same then as now, and that Abraham did as all mankind have since done, took advantage of the customs of the country and paid out his poorest metal money, for the second verse of the thirteenth chapter tells us that Abraham was very rich in cattle, silver, and gold.

We have no knowledge as to the relative value of the two metals at that time, but the position of the word "gold" in the sentence clearly demonstrates its greater importance, and from that day to this, no matter what the coinage of any nation has prescribed or what change in values may have been attempted by legislation, the world's standard of value has been gold, and gold has been the "1," the unit of value by which all ratios have been fixed.

Not only that, but to this day, whatever the law of any country may declare to be a legal tender, the money of commerce, the money current with the merchant, the money used in adjustment of international balances, is weighed as Abraham weighed his, and quantity and quality alone measure values, without reference to any marks that may be stamped upon it.

A while ago I saw in the Bank of England the judgment day of the coinage of the world.

A half dozen automatic scales were receiving the coins in hoppers, and, sliding down long grooves, each coin rested a moment in a balance.

If light weight, the arm lifted and tossed the coin to the right.

If full weight, the arm dropped and the coin was thrown to the left.

It was justice working automatically.

The intrinsic worth of each piece preserved it as it was or sent it to the melting pot.

Passing down into the vaults of that famous institution, I saw in one room $20,000,000 of American coin that had been run into gold bars.

They looked like copper ingots.

Each one was tagged with the assayer's certificate of weight and fineness and was ready for sale, as iron or coal or copper would be, by weight.

Last year alone more than thirteen millions of foreign gold coin were received by the mint of the United States, and, without reference to the form and stamp upon them, were melted into bars and valued by their weight and fineness only.

Through all recorded time the intelligent choice of all mankind has made pure gold the final measure of values, even though its tools of exchange may have been, from time to time, cattle, corn, metal, paper, or any other of the many things used as currency which temporary convenience may have suggested.

I do not believe that any people ever advanced far enough in the path of civilization to become familiar with metallic money but that, consciously or unconsciously, its coinage or token system bore some recognized relation to gold as the standard of value.

There certainly is no nation in the world to-day which does not thus recognize it.

Why this is so I need not stop to explain, for natural selection needs no argument to justify itself.

It is enough that it is so and that every advocate of silver or any other standard acknowledges it when he urges the use of anything else as money on any other basis than 1 to 1, or an exact equality with gold.

Mr. SIMPSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HILL. I prefer not to be interrupted.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HOPKINS). The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SIMPSON. I just want to ask——

Mr. HILL. I said I should prefer not to yield, as I have not the time to finish what I wish to say.

Mr. SIMPSON. I wish to ask the gentleman if he does not think that, as this bill which is under consideration is to authorize the Washington and Glen Echo Railroad Company——

Mr. HILL. I prefer not to yield. I appreciate the courtesy which the gentleman manifests.

Mr. SIMPSON. I am glad you do.

The CHAIRMAN. One moment. The Chair trusts that no gentleman will interrupt a member who has the floor after he has signified a desire not to be interrupted.

Mr. SIMPSON. I thought the Chairman was making so much noise with the gavel that the gentleman did not hear me.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not the first error into which the gentleman from Kansas has fallen during this session.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, by the courtesy of the gentleman from Kansas, I will continue.

ARTIFICIAL STANDARDS.

Starting, then, with the assumption that the universal measure of value is and always has been gold, the question naturally arises, Why should anything else be used as money, and why should an artificial standard be set up?

And here the second attribute of money appears as a tool of exchange.

As a standard measure of value quality alone is required, and a unit of its kind would suffice for all the world, but as a tool of exchange a convenient number of units are needed, and, strange as it may seem, the ruder and less developed society is, the greater the number required to effect exchanges.

Hence it is that, as the nations of the earth have one after another passed from barbarism to civilization, they have left behind them the wampum, the cattle, and the slaves; then the iron, the lead, and the copper, and reached out for the precious metals, silver and gold, as better fitting their changed conditions, always striving for the best that was attainable.

During the past hundred years this process of evolution has gone forward more rapidly than ever before, until practically the whole world, and actually all of the commercial world except Mexico, has suspended the free and unlimited coinage of silver as standard money, and either adopted the single gold standard, or a limited bimetallism such as obtains in the United States, where silver is being coined on Government account, but limited in quantity to our ability to maintain its parity with gold.

The reason for this great and sweeping change in the monetary systems of the world is neither mysterious nor strange.

In my opinion it is simply the enormous increase in the production of gold, the universally accepted measure of values, so that it not only promises to be but actually is now in the possession of mankind in sufficient quantity to become under the more highly organized commercial methods the best tool of exchange of which the world now has any knowledge.

Think for a moment what this increase has been.

INCREASE OF GOLD SUPPLY.

During the three hundred and fifty years from the discovery of America to the opening of the California mines in 1850 the entire world's product of gold had been but little more than three billions of dollars' worth ($3,121,880,000), or an annual average of eight and three-quarter millions ($8,720,200).

It was only just before the beginning of this period that the art of printing had been discovered, and during the greater part of these three and a half centuries the steam engine, the steamship, the railroad, the telegraph, and the telephone were unknown.

None of the means of communication which now bring nations and individuals the world over into daily and hourly touch with each other in their business relations were even thought of.

Checks, notes, drafts, and bills of exchange, by which 90 per cent of the commercial transactions of the nineteenth century have been carried on, had no existence then, and the modern system of banking had not been developed.

Goldsmiths and jewelers were the bankers and brokers of that time, and the actual gold and silver passed from man to man and nation to nation in the settlement of all transactions.

During the same period the world's production of silver was a little over six billions of dollars ($6,196,504,000), or an annual average of seventeen and one-third millions each year, or about double the product of gold.

Both together added but twenty-six millions per year to the world's stock of money, and even from this must be deducted the amount used in the arts, and it is by no means improbable that this amount was greater in proportion to the population than now, when we have the process of electroplating fully developed.

Is it not easy to understand, in view of these facts, how that both metals were a necessity as money, and that the more abundant was accepted as a measure of value and means of exchange?

With both in use domestic trade was largely barter and international trade was greatly hindered.

CHANGE TO GOLD STANDARD BEGUN.

But the gold accumulation of the centuries gradually forced its way into the channels of trade, and in 1798 England stopped the free coinage of silver, and in 1816, in the face of a sharp decline in gold production, adopted the single gold standard, and declared her purpose to thereafter build up her financial system under it.

For forty years she stood alone, but with the best tools of trade in her possession, she could afford to wait, and while she waited she became the leader of commerce and the financial center of the world.

From that day to this the English pound sterling has known no geographical limit, no national boundary lines, but among every people the world around has silently pursued its mission of adding to England's wealth and increasing England's power.

But in 1850 something happened to gold.

Suddenly from the rocks and hills of California and Australia the stores of golden treasure were poured out, and in a single bound the world's average production went from eight to one hundred and twenty-seven millions of dollars, and in the forty-seven years since the aggregate addition to the world's tools of exchange in gold alone has been $6,101,490,600, as against three billions one hundred millions in the entire three and a half centuries preceding.

Is it any wonder that the nations of the earth have fallen into line and one after another, discarding the costly and cumbrous methods of the past, with a world-wide unanimity have chosen gold as their measure of value and tool of exchange?

To me the wonder is that in these closing days of the nineteenth century a great political party in this progressive Republic should stand before the people upon a theory rejected and thrown aside by all the world within the memory of those now living and, ignoring the addition of over three billions of gold to the world's stock since 1873, should now ask us to go back to the double standard and the unlimited coinage of both metals, and thus put ourselves at the mercy of other nations to plunder us of either at their pleasure.

It would seem as though the frozen sands of the Klondike and the quartz reefs of South Africa would melt with indignation at such a proposition.

This nation will go forward, not backward, in the path of progress, and on that march the rightful place of the United States is in the front rank.

THE DOUBLE STANDARD WITH FREE COINAGE IMPOSSIBLE.

A double standard with free coinage of both metals is an impossibility, but the enlarged use of silver as the willing servant of gold is not only possible, but is even demonstrated as an established fact.

Through all recorded time its value has decreased.

History tells us that 4 ounces of silver were once the equal of an ounce of gold.

It was 8 to 1 under Julius Cæsar, 11 to 1 when America was discovered, 15 to 1 when this nation began its coinage, 16 to 1 in 1837, 22 to 1 in 1890, and 40 to 1 in September, 1897.

Its steady course has been downward, unhindered by legislation, influenced in part by its larger production, but far more by the accumulating and annually increasing supply of gold.

The anomaly is in the fact that the lowest price is concurrent with the largest use, for since 1873 there has been an increase in the silver monetary stock of the thirteen principal nations of the world of $670,900,000, and the bulk of this has been full legal-tender coinage.

In fact, the claim that silver has been demonetized, either in the sense that its monetary function or its legal-tender quality has been taken away, is utterly wrong, for this is true of only a total of $163,430,460 sold by Germany, Roumania, and Scandinavia, and probably this silver was recoined into subsidiary money.

Whether it was or not, is of no consequence, for it was less than a year's product, and the aggregate legal-tender coinage has increased as shown.

The only quality that it has lost is that of the standard, and that it was never fit for and never would have received but for the insufficient supply of gold.

Neither is it true, as claimed by some, that depriving silver of its function as a standard has materially helped to reduce its value.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Has not silver been deprived of the redemption quality?

Mr. HILL. I will show you that it has not.

No metal with a production in excess of requirement, or of limited production concurrently with another better fitted for monetary purposes, can have one particle of value given to it by a free and unlimited coinage.

Not an ounce of it is taken from the world's market.

The bullion in the coin and the ingot will be precisely the same in price, and the one adapted to and available for the same uses as the other.

A limited coinage, with the value of the coin maintained at parity with gold by governmental credit, does remove that exact quantity from the general stock, and in proportion to such decreased supply will tend to increase the market price.

All experience proves that fact, and the Mexican dollar is the best possible evidence of it to-day.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Connecticut suspend for a moment?

Mr. HILL. I will not, sir, at the request of the gentleman from Kansas. I appreciate courtesy and would be glad to be courteous to those who are courteous to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to suggest to the gentleman from Connecticut——

Mr. HILL. I will suspend at the request of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to suggest that the gentleman from Kansas rises to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SIMPSON. The parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I make the point of order that the gentleman has no right, under the guise of parliamentary inquiry, to stop a gentleman who has the floor from proceeding with his argument. At any interval of business or during the progress of action by the House a parliamentary inquiry is proper, but it is wholly improper and impertinent now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not assume that the gentleman from Kansas—the Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SIMPSON. I will state the parliamentary inquiry, and then the gentleman from Ohio will have better knowledge——

Mr. GROSVENOR. "The gentleman from Ohio" understands perfectly the object of this.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I hope this does not come out of my time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I make the point of order that the gentleman has no right to make a parliamentary inquiry during the remarks of a gentleman who has the floor and is addressing the House.

Mr. SIMPSON. The parliamentary inquiry which I desire to submit is whether it is in order to discuss the gold standard when we have a bill under consideration to authorize the Washington and Glen Echo Railroad Company to gain a right of way and construct tracks into the District of Columbia 600 feet?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that that is not a proper parliamentary inquiry at this time.

Mr. SIMPSON. Then I make the point of order that the gentleman from Connecticut is out of order in discussing the gold standard or any question of that kind on a bill to authorize a street railroad company to acquire a right of way.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut can not be interrupted.

Mr. SIMPSON. Does the Chair overrule my point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kansas please take his seat? The gentleman from Connecticut will proceed.

Mr. SIMPSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask the Chair, Does he overrule my point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that he declined to entertain the gentleman's inquiry as not being pertinent at this time.

Mr. SIMPSON. But I made the point of order that the gentleman was out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair trusts that the gentleman from Kansas will observe the rules of the House.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the Chair rule on the point of order? Will he hear me on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair declines to hear the gentleman.

Mr. SIMPSON. And declines to rule on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas will please take his seat.

Mr. SIMPSON. Well, I want the Chair to rule on that point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call upon the officer of the House to have the gentleman take his seat, if he declines to do so.

Mr. SIMPSON. I think the Chair ought to be more courteous than that, and ought to rule on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the Sergeant-at-Arms please have the gentleman take his seat.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared with the mace.

Mr. HANDY. I make the point of order that that has to be done in the House and not in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SIMPSON. You had better take that back. It is nothing but a buzzard, anyway. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut will proceed.

TWO CLASSES OF FREE-SILVER ADVOCATES.

Mr. HILL. I fully understand that there are two classes of advocates of the free and unlimited coinage of silver.

One class believes, and believes honestly, that by an unlimited demand working upon a limited supply, additional value will be given, which will bring it to an equality with gold.

While I am willing to concede their honesty of purpose, I must totally disagree with their conclusions.

I heard once of a man who, on retiring for the night, found the blankets too short to properly cover his person, with the result that he suffered all night long from cold feet.

The next night, with the enthusiasm born of a new idea, he cut a strip from the upper end of the blanket and pinned it to the lower end and then retired in the firm belief that his troubles were all over.

He was doubtless honest, but had poor judgment.

I would remind these gentlemen who would legislate value into silver of the old conundrum which I used to hear when I was a boy: "If you call a dog's tail a leg, how many legs would a dog have?" and, to save them any waste of gray matter in guessing it, will state that the answer was, "Four; for calling the tail a leg does not make it one."

The second class is made up of those who do not believe that silver can acquire added value from legislation, but who desire free coinage purely as an inflation scheme.

As an illustration of that class, I cite the last Democratic candidate for the Presidency, who some time ago, in a speech in Brooklyn, said: "We do not want to change the ratio. It is not because we produce silver that we want 16 to 1, but because we own property and owe debts."

It is further illustrated by the action of forty-two United States Senators who, when a short time ago the question of paying the Government bonds in silver was under consideration, voted down the Nelson amendment, which declared that—

It is the duty of the Government of the United States, under existing laws, to maintain the parity of its gold and silver money, so that a dollar of the one metal shall for all monetary purposes always be the equal in value to a dollar of the other metal.

And who made a still more specific declaration of their views and purposes by defeating the Caffery amendment, which provided that—

If at the time of payment of the principal and interest on the bonds herein mentioned the market value of silver is not on a par with gold at the ratio of 16 to 1, the principal of said bonds shall be paid in gold or silver at the option of the creditor.

For such declarations and for the principle or lack of principle on which they are based I have neither sympathy nor respect, nor do I believe that any man or party acting in accordance therewith will ever receive the indorsement of the honest people of this country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

VOLUME OF MONEY AND PRICES.

The recent manifestoes issued jointly by the chairmen of the Democratic, the Populist, and the Silver-mine parties declare in effect that the adoption of the gold standard by the principal nations of the world has largely reduced the volume of money, and that as a result prices have declined, development has been checked, and wages have been reduced.

As an unanswerable argument against this, I submit the following table showing the approximate stock of gold, silver, and uncovered paper money in the principal countries of the world in 1873 and in 1897, with the changes between these dates:

Approximate stock of gold, silver, and uncovered paper money in the principal countries of the world in 1873 and 1897 and changes between those dates, expressed in millions.

*Decrease.

Net increase, $2,650,200,000.

I would especially call attention to the footings, which show that these nations in 1897 had $2,581,800,000 of gold and $670,900,000 of silver more than they had in 1873, while the uncovered paper money—the demand obligations of these nations—shows a decrease of $602,500,000, making a net increase of currency in twenty-three years of $2,650,200,000.

But not only is it true that the actual monetary stock of the world has been largely increased, but it is also true that this increase has outstripped the increase of population.

Take as an example our own country.

In 1878 we had per capita $3.24 of gold as against $9.55 now, 0.15 of silver as against $8.70 now, and $17.97 of paper as against $5.45 now, making a total per capita of all forms of money of $21.36 in 1873 against $23.70 now.

England has increased her per capita from $9.90 to $20.65, Germany from $13.59 to $18.95, Belgium from $14.44 to $25.70, Italy from $4.88 to $9.69, the Netherlands from $16.56 to $33.65, Sweden from $2.75 to $6.90, Denmark from $10.05 to $11.83, Australasia from $20.38 to $32.32, and Norway from $6.39 to $6.65, while Russia has decreased 61 cents, Austria 16 cents, and France $2.31.

But not only do these figures show conclusively that there has been no shrinkage in the volume of money, but it is found that the actual increase far exceeds the entire world's production of silver, less the amount used in the arts since 1873.

I am well aware that in response to this showing of the increase of the world's volume of money the advocate of free coinage will still claim that such increase is not in what he calls "money of final redemption."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Not measured by the amount of business.

Mr. HILL. I am coming to that feature right now.

While I deny that there is any such thing as a particular money of final redemption in our system where we have four kinds of legal tender with the right of exchange of one for the other indiscriminately under the parity clause of the act of 1893, yet I am willing to concede that what is meant is "standard" money and will test this claim on that basis only.

In 1873, under the double standard, the United States had:

[See Mint Report, 1897, page 42.]

Gold	$135,000,000
Silver	6,150,000
Total specie	141,150,000
Paper	749,445,610

Taking silver and gold together, the money of final redemption was 18.83 per cent of the money to be redeemed.

In 1897 the United States had:

[See Mint Report, 1897, page 37.]

Gold	$996,300,000
Silver	634,500,000
Paper	731,772,151
Silver and paper	1,366,272,151

So that in gold alone the money of final redemption is now 50.96 per cent of the money to be redeemed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. You count silver as redemption money?

Mr. HILL. No; I am taking your view of the case.

And though counting silver and paper as subject to redemption in standard money, yet we are nearly three times as well prepared for this as we were in 1873, with both metals in use for that purpose.

Again, the loans and discounts of State banks in 1860 were $706,333,272.22; specie held (gold and silver), $82,638,510.00.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Right there, if you will allow me a question.

Mr. HILL. I would if I had time; but I have not now time enough for myself.

There is no better way of testing this question of business requirements than from loans and discounts.

Loans and discounts of national banks February 18, 1898, were $2,138,078,280.43; gold held, $222,855,516.77. So that it appears that, according to the population at each period, the gold held in 1898 was $3.06 per capita, and the specie—gold and silver—held in 1860 was $2.69 per capita.

Not only that, but where, in 1860, the specie holdings of banks were 11.6 per cent of the loans and discounts, in February, 1898, notwithstanding an enormous expansion of the credit system and the use of other legal tender as bank reserves, the gold alone was 10.42 per cent of the loans and discounts.

I have shown—

First. That the actual volume of money has enormously increased under the gold standard.

Second. That this increase has exceeded the increase of population.

Third. That gold alone, or the money of ultimate redemption, now is nearly threefold more abundant compared with other money than gold and silver together were in 1873.

Fourth. That gold alone is as capable now of carrying the credit system of the country as gold and silver were in 1860.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to call your attention to the amount of business——

Mr. HILL. I will talk it over with you when the House adjourns. I can not yield to the gentleman.

In view of these facts, what becomes of this triplet proposition that the shrinkage in the volume of the world's money has reduced prices and checked development?

The truth is, and it is coming to be more and more accepted, that it is the quality rather than the quantity of money that influences prices, conditions of supply and demand being unchanged, and that the quantitative theory ignores rapidity of circulation, improved facilities of exchange, and the modern use of credit instruments.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. HILL. I decline to yield.

Mr. SIMPSON. I would like to have order. I can not hear what the gentleman is saying about this bill. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will please be in order.

Mr. SIMPSON. I want to know about this railroad, Mr. Chairman, and there is so much confusion I can not hear.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

BANK CREDITS IGNORED.

Mr. HILL. I am quite sure that in considering the subject of the volume of money our free-silver friends forget the bank credits of this and other countries, which amount to more than $16,000,000,000 ($16,051,137,349), consisting of capital, surplus, circulation, and deposits of commercial banks and banks of issue only, all savings banks being excluded both here and abroad.

This enormous sum is to all intents and purposes available as money and performs all of the functions of a tool of exchange.

As against the $23.70 per capita of money here, there is a banking power of $72.61; in Great Britain, $110.66; Australasia, $136; Switzerland, $86.71; Denmark, $67.64; Canada, $57.10; Sweden, $46.95; Straits Settlements, $39.60; Netherlands, $19.22; France, $24.23; Belgium, $19.15; Austria, $13.68; Germany, $8.94; Italy, $8.76; Russia, $6.33; Mexico, $3.88; Turkey, $1.12; Japan, $6.88. (Compiled from the Report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1897, pages 594, 595, 596.)

Add the deposits of savings banks to the rating of the United States and it will carry us to over a hundred dollars per capita ($102.52).

This is a factor in the financial problem that must be reckoned with.

Compared with the volume of money, it exceeds it fourfold here and fivefold in Great Britain.

It is a structure built up from the bed rock of confidence in a fixed and unchanging unit of value—gold.

Undermine this, cut this in two by legislation for fiat money, and "the subsequent proceedings will interest us no more," for there will not be enough left to worry over. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY AND THE WAGE-EARNER.

There is one claim in this recent manifesto which I confess is a surprise to me.

For the past three years we have been told again and again that in order to meet the competition of the silver-standard nations we must adopt the same policy and pay our labor in depreciated money, and the rapidly increasing dangers of oriental competition have been sounded in our ears as something which could not be overcome by a protective tariff and which would yield to no treatment but the heroic one of free silver coinage.

I had begun to breathe freer and to think that perhaps the danger was over when Japan and India adopted the gold standard and thus voluntarily surrendered all of the advantages of low wages paid in cheap money which they formerly possessed, but I never expected to see our Democratic and silver-mine party friends face squarely about and charge the reduced wages of the past four years, which it was one of their main objects to perpetuate, to the present financial policy of this nation.

For forty years the pride and boast of the Republican party has been that American labor has been the best-paid labor in all the world, and, since the resumption of specie payment in 1879, paid in the best money of the world.

The very inception of that party was as an organized protest against human slavery, and it poured out its blood and treasure in 1861 that labor might be free, for it knew that when the lower stratum was lifted all would rise.

In the providence of God and amid the storm of war slavery died, and from that day this nation marched on and up, till, in 1892, a single day's wages would bring to the home of the American workman more of the comfort and luxuries of life than mankind had ever dreamed of for like service since the fall of Adam; and then, intoxicated by our success and fooled by the very men who now preach the gospel of free silver and fiat money, we opened wide the doors of this great nation to the unrestricted competition of other lands, and in a single day lost all the fruits of a struggle which had lasted thirty years.

But four years of hardship and privation have not blotted from the memory of the toilers of this nation the achievements of the past; and while I can not speak for other portions of the land, I do believe that this fall, as in 1896, the workingmen of New England will march in solid column to the polls to sustain that party which has stood by them.

Mr. Chairman, out of all the misery and wretchedness of that useless sacrifice of four years of American progress one scene comes back to me which I can never forget.

In the town of Torrington, the banner Republican town of my State, a few days after the splendid political victory of '94, a jubilee was being held. The whole town was ablaze with bonfires and illuminations.

As the procession passed down the street between the separate cottages of American workingmen we came to one house lighted from garret to cellar and decorated in every conceivable spot with American flags.

It was the home of a mechanic who, strange to say, had always before voted the Democratic ticket.

The front door stood wide open, and in the bright light which streamed forth the mother stood watching the passing crowd.

Halfway between the door and the street a large box had been placed, and standing on it was a little girl dressed in white and waving the flag as the procession passed.

It was a beautiful sight, but what attracted my attention most was this inscription on the front of the box at her feet:

Papa is in the parade; mamma and I are happy.

It was only the expression of a thought of a child, but it told the glad story that hope had come to them again.

Mr. Chairman, the working men and women of New England are looking forward to the day when the full old-time prosperity shall come again, when every man shall be at work and every child shall be at school and every mother shall be at home singing the song of happiness and content.

When that time does come and protection wages are fully restored, I want them paid in gold or its full equivalent, as they have been for twenty years.

You planters in the South and miners in the West may vote for fiat money and free silver if you will. I want the shining gold, with the highest possible purchasing power, for New England workingmen.

WAGES IN THE UNITED STATES.

Two years ago the Secretary of State sent instructions to our consular officers all over the world to report, among other things, the effect of the then existing currency systems in the countries where they were stationed upon the rates of labor.

Every word of this testimony is from Democratic sources, for they were all appointees of the party then in power.

It is an unanswerable argument from our political opponents in favor of the single gold standard as the one system which will best conserve the welfare of the American workman and establish and maintain a permanent prosperity within our borders.

At the very beginning of these quotations I will place a table showing the relative wages in gold in all occupations in the United States from 1840 to 1891.

The time covered includes every system of finance which the nation has had—first, the double standard nominally; second, the irredeemable paper money of the war time, and third, from resumption in 1879 to 1891.

It is taken from the Senate Finance Committe Report on Prices, Wages, and Transportation, printed in 1893.

It shows two things. First, a slow but steady advance before the war, a sharp decline, but gradual recovery during the paper-money period, and a uniformly upward tendency thereafter.

There are no statistics since 1892, and I am glad of it, for they would have been neither satisfactory nor creditable to the American people for the four years succeeding.

HUMAN LABOR THE BEST MEASURE OF GOLD.

The second point to which I would call attention is, that human labor is the most uniform and most reliable in supply of anything which the Lord has put on this planet.

The chinch bug, the weevil and the potato bug, frost, drought, and storm may all affect the product of the field.

The area of cultivation may be extended or decreased.

Invention, improved machinery, new mines discovered, oil fields exhausted, all these things serve to increase or decrease the products of our farms and shops, and in these modern days the "gold bug" must take all the blame, but human labor in this table measures gold and proves beyond dispute the stability of the existing standard and the wisdom of its continuance.

Relative wages in gold in all occupations, 1840 to 1891, grouped by different methods.

CONSULAR REPORTS ON WAGES.

The reports to follow will generally cover the ten years previous to 1896, and refer to Europe and North America only.

England.—Single gold standard.

The opinion seems rather to be that industry may be impeded by a bad system of money, and great social mischief and confusion produced; but a good monetary system can do no more than let the various forces of industry work unchecked. It is held also that the English monetary system is of this sort. There is no doubt about the standard money; there is an abundant and even indefinite amount of currency for all payments and transactions: credit is vastly developed. But the system has been in existence for generations the same as now, and there could not be any noticeable stimulus due to a monetary cause between the dates mentioned, as there has been no change in the system in the interval.

Rates of wages in the principal occupations were somewhat higher than in 1886, except in agriculture.

The record of changes in wages now made by the labor department from year to year shows that the general wage level changes very slowly.

Canada.—Single gold standard.

In the census taken in 1891, the average wages paid in manufacturing and mechanical industries are shown. These industries were classified as follows:

Industries having an annual output of $25,000 and more:
Wages per employee, 1881	$296.20
Wages per employee, 1891	346.60
Increase in ten years	50.40
Percentage increase	18.3
Industries having an annual output exceeding $500 and less than $25,000:
Wages per employee, 1881	216.68
Wages per employee, 1891	244.24
Increase in ten years	27.56
Percentage increase	12.07

Belgium.—Double standard, but no coinage under it for twenty years.

The rates of wages were practically the same in 1886. Since that date wages have not undergone any sensible variation.

Netherlands.—Double standard, but mints open to gold only.

A slight advance in wages.

France.—Double standard, but mints open to gold only.

For the last fifteen years wages, both for skilled and unskilled labor, have slowly but regularly increased in France.

Germany.—Single gold standard.

A general advance. In Rhenish Westphalia textile industries wages increased from about $143 per capita in 1886 to about $163 in 1895.

Day labor shows a general slight advance.

In many trades the advance is marked from 1886 to 1892.

Rates of wages of the workingmen in shops of railroads under Government control.

1885-86	47,402	43,306,825	10,311,148.80	913.60	217.52
1894-95	58,145	59,630,899	14,197,833.09	1,025.50	244.16

Austria.—Gold standard since 1892; formerly silver; free coinage abolished in 1878.

During the period embraced between the years 1886 and 1896 manufacturing industries have been stimulated, owing, it is considered, to the development and improvement of foreign trade. Wages have likewise increased during the above period, as will be seen by the annexed table. The expressed opinion of the leading manufacturers seems to be that the increase in wages is due to political reasons rather than to any changes in the currency. To meet the demand of the labor party for a legal working day of eight hours, a compromise was effected by increasing the rate of wages and making the working day ten hours.

Switzerland.—Double standard; mints open to gold only.

It is universally known and recognized that the wages for all classes of labor have very appreciably increased within the last ten years and the condition of the laboring man greatly improved. This, however, is attributed almost exclusively to the better organization of labor, their unions enabling them to demand higher wages.

Italy.—Double standard; mints open to gold only.

According to statistics got together and published by the director-general of agriculture, there has been a marked increase in the wages of agricultural laborers. But owing to the minimum wages originally earned in this labor, the increase seemed greater than it has been in fact, if the normal condition of living be considered. A general increase is to be noted, however, and especially in those industries in which inventions have made improvements, yet even this branch has its exceptions, as in the case of silk spinning. At the same time the prices of products in general use have gone down and the hours of labor have generally been lessened.

Mexico.—Nominally, double standard; actually, silver.

As regards wages paid in Mexico, it has been found impossible to obtain any accurate statistics as to the rate which was paid ten years ago. The Government statistics at that time were not very accurate; but from all the obtainable information, derived from hearing the facts and views of well-informed persons cognizant of the conditions existing then and now, it can safely be stated that as regards skilled labor there has been a slight increase, both in the amount paid and in the demand, while as regards unskilled labor the conditions may be said to be substantially the same.

The amount of wages paid varies throughout the Republic, being higher in some sections than in others, and in certain mining districts lower than they were ten to fifteen years ago. This is generally owing to local causes. As a matter of course, owing to the construction and management of 7,000 miles of railroads, the introduction of electricity, and the placing of new and improved machinery in many of the mines and in some of the agricultural districts, there has been an increase in the number of skilled laborers and some increase in the demand for the same; but it is true that, with the great mass of the Mexican laborers, there has been but little if any change in the amount of wages paid.

As might naturally be expected, there are some instances where laborers receive more than ten years ago, but these are the exceptions. There are also many instances where less is received. The daily wage paid to the farm laborer hired by the day does not exceed 30 cents per day, taking into account the whole laboring agricultural population. There are instances where the day laborer receives 50 cents per day; but again there are also instances where he only receives 15 to 20 cents. The secretary of the treasury of Mexico estimates the daily wages of farm laborers at 25 cents.

British Honduras.—Gold standard since 1894; formerly silver.

The laboring man has been materially benefited, beyond the shadow of a doubt, and well he knows it, as against his silver wages, as prior to the gold standard his pay was, in silver, from $10 to $14 a month, and what he had to buy and pay for out of his wages was increased proportionately as silver decreased commercially. Now (at the date of writing) he gets paid in gold what he then got in silver, and what he now buys is not subject to the fluctuation of silver. The price of labor ranged pretty evenly from 1886 up to October, 1894. There may have been some little difference in wages during that period, but not of any moment.

[From the report of the governor.]

The laboring classes, the backbone of the colony, have largely benefited as regards wages, the dollars now earned equaling the number formerly received by them in sols. Savings-bank deposits have increased. Land and house property, whether in town or country, has increased 100 per cent in value, commanding now in gold the same amount received formerly in the money it replaced.

Nicaragua.—Silver standard.

There are few manufacturing industries in Nicaragua, and the existing currency has done nothing to stimulate them. The people prefer agricultural pursuits to manufacturing enterprises. The wages of the working classes occupied in all kinds of labor range from 40 cents to $1.50 silver (18.8 cents to 70¼ cents gold) per day for unskilled or skilled labor. Clerks and the higher classes of laborers receive from $3 to $6 (94 cents to $1.82 gold) per day.

Costa Rica.—Nominally, double standard; actually, silver.

In 1886 prices of labor may be considered to have been one-third less than they are to-day—in Costa Rican currency.

Wages (peons), 1886, $1; 1896, $1.50.

The increase of wages, measured in gold, since 1886 is apparent only. Peons receive now less gold than they did in 1886.

Denmark.—Gold standard.

I have talked with the director-general of foreign affairs and others on the practical effect of the currency on manufacturing and the wages of labor, etc., and have learned in a general way that, though Denmark is not largely a manufacturing country, industrial enterprise is generally increasing, and the wages of labor have increased here, as they have, happily, throughout Europe; but whether this increase is attributable to the currency—with which the people generally seem satisfied, though there is a large party here which favors a double standard of gold and silver—is a matter of conjecture and argument.

Consul Ryder, in 1884, made an exhaustive report specifying the wages of laborers in many lines of industry. I have been informed that wages have advanced, on an average, about 10 per cent since that time.

Portugal.—Gold standard, but specie payments suspended in 1891.

Since the suspension of specie payments there has been certainly some increase in the manufacturing industries, but not sufficiently marked to attract attention. The average rate of wages paid for labor, skilled and unskilled, has remained about the same as it was when the country was on a specie basis.

In a general way, it can only be said that while labor, both skilled and unskilled, has remained at substantially the same wage, the prices of agricultural products, clothing, groceries, boots and shoes, hardware, drugs, etc., have increased about 25 per cent, which is about the premium of gold.

Russia.—Silver standard at time of this report; since changed to single gold standard.

As to the growth of manufactures, it has long been stimulated by a protective tariff as well as by the ability of the manufacturers to pay their workmen approximately the old scale of wages in the cheaper money of the present system [then referring to silver].

An inquiry into wages does not show that the workmen participate appreciably in the benefits bestowed upon these industries. Official statistics showing the condition of agriculture are lacking, except as respects the rates and course of wages in agricultural pursuits, which will be shown in a later part of this report. It suffices to state here, where the general effect is being considered, that I have not read or heard a word favorable to the condition of agriculture; that the universal testimony is of extreme depression, and the wages of the agricultural laborers, as shown by the official table referred to, have had, in the main, a downward tendency.

Spain.—Double standard; mint open to gold only.

All information received from as reliable sources as individual observers can be indicate two things: First, that so far as unskilled labor is concerned, wages have remained stationary; second, that though among skilled laborers for the same amount of skill wages have remained stationary, yet owing to some of the more recent industrial enterprises undertaken in Spain, requiring greater expertness or specialism, the average of wages for skilled laborers, a considerable number of whom are foreigners, has been raised.

During the last ten years, among the higher class of employees in the service of the railways, the wages or salaries have been raised to some extent, as has been done with Government employees, but any connection between this rise and the shrinkage in the value of Spanish currency has been absolutely disclaimed.

Sweden.—Gold standard. From tables given by the American minister a general advance is shown for past ten years.

Norway.—Gold standard.

The existing currency established by law of June 4, 1873, has not had any practical and direct influence on the manufacturing industries and the wages of labor. The latter have increased during the last decade in this country as elsewhere, which will be seen from the subjoined tables taken from the official statistics, but probably from reasons different from the introduction of the gold unit. The last statistics published by the central statistical bureau of Norway do not embrace any later year than 1890, which is compared with the statistics of 1885. But it may be safely said that since the former year the wages of labor have steadily increased, though I am unable to state the actual rates.

No comment upon these quotations is necessary, for the fact is clearly established that under the gold standard business conditions have been settled and a general advance of wages has occurred both in Europe and America; that not only have higher wages been paid, but they have been paid in money of the greatest purchasing power, and that if any decline in wages is found, it is in silver standard countries.

THE GOLD STANDARD THE WORLD'S CHOICE.

Mr. Chairman, within the limit of the century now drawing to a close 855,000,000 of the population of the globe have voluntarily abandoned the free coinage of silver and chosen gold as their standard measure of value.

They comprise the skill, the genius, the intelligence, the culture, the enterprise, the progress, and the wealth of the world.

To every one of the other countries, belated stragglers on the march of time, or not yet emerged from barbarism, we are sending missionaries to-day to lead them up to civilization and a higher life.

The advocate of free silver coinage may turn to such a source for wisdom and counsel on financial methods if he will, but this great Republic will not follow him, for its people have been taught by their own experience that a currency solidly based on gold has not only built up the nation in the days of peace, but is its best defense in time of war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOWLER of New Jersey. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended until he finishes his remarks.

Mr. HANDY. That simply cuts off the time of other gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GIBSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution (S. R. 143) authorizing the use of a part of the appropriation heretofore made for the relief of the destitute citizens of the United States in the Island of Cuba for the aid of such citizens, refugees, and others who have reached our shores; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

On April 9, 1898:

H. Res. 178. Joint resolution granting permission for the erection of a monument or statue in Washington City, D. C., in honor of the late Albert Pike.

On April 11, 1898:

H. R. 1034. An act granting a pension to William H. Byrum;
H. R. 7008. An act granting pension to R. G. English;
H. R. 6931. An act granting a pension to James B. Rawlins;
H. R. 4526. An act granting a pension to Mary Vockey;
H. R. 5083. An act granting a pension to Thomas Lane;
H. R. 3661. An act granting a pension to Charles L. Stephens;
H. R. 2349. An act granting a pension to Mrs. Weltha Post-Leggett;
H. R. 3915. An act granting a pension to Delia Elizabeth Woodward;

H. R. 2295. An act granting a pension to Mary J. Hart;
H. R. 7827. An act granting a pension to Elizabeth M. Tumy;
H. R. 2272. An act granting an increase of pension to John N. Bruce:
H. R. 771. An act granting an increase of pension to Bernard Dunn;
H. R. 2275. An act granting an increase of pension to Isaac B. Vail;
H. R. 3798. An act granting an increase of pension to Milton Iserman;
H. R. 2199. An act granting an increase of pension to Henry F. Rice;
H. R. 4624. An act granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Herd;
H. R. 2924. An act granting an increase of pension to R. A. Browning;
H. R. 3212. An act granting an increase of pension to Barbara Miller;
H. R. 3184. An act granting an increase of pension to James H. Blakeman;
H. R. 1381. An act granting an increase of pension to Elisha M. Luckett;
H. R. 345. An act granting an increase of pension to George D. Cook;
H. R. 1306. An act increasing the pension of William Warner;
H. R. 1802. An act increasing the pension of Mary E. Wallick;
H. R. 3802. An act increasing the pension of Francis M. Bruner;
H. R. 290. An act to increase the pension of William H. Webster;
H. R. 1957. An act to increase the pension of William P. Cooper;
H. R. 4116. An act to increase the pension of Charles C. Short;
H. R. 4299. An act for increase of pension of Alexander E. Ingraham;
H. R. 3160. An act to place on the pension roll the name of Minerva Sample;
H. R. 2970. An act to permit an increase of the pension of John A. Anderson;
H. R. 6906. An act to authorize the Shreveport Bridge and Terminal Company to construct and maintain a bridge across Red River, in the State of Louisiana, at or near Shreveport;
H. R. 5489. An act extending the right of commutation to certain homestead settlers on lands in Oklahoma Territory opened to settlement under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to ratify and confirm the agreement with the Kickapoo Indians in Oklahoma Territory, and to make appropriations for carrying the same into effect;" and
H. R. 5030. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across St. Francis River, in the State of Arkansas.

WASHINGTON AND GLEN ECHO RAILROAD COMPANY.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STOKES].

Mr. HILL. I respectfully ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to print the balance of his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Chairman, much time has been spent, and profitably spent, during this session in discussion of the relative cotton manufacturing interests of the South and of the North. The superiority of the advantages of the South in respect to cotton manufacturing has been conclusively demonstrated by several gentlemen. But the argument of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS] is in my judgment to be credited with particular merit for its unanswerable arraignment of the national labor law agitation.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] has admitted the advantages possessed by the South in this respect, and with a magnanimity of spirit and nobility of sentiment rarely surpassed upon this floor or elsewhere—has bid us godspeed and largest prosperity. I am not here to disparage the cotton-manufacturing interests of the South or of the North. I am here to aid cotton-manufacturing interests everywhere in every proper way.

LET THE COTTON GROWERS BE HEARD.

But, Mr. Chairman, what I am more concerned about is the cotton-growing interests of the South. The one industry is prosperous to an unusual degree. The other is languishing to an unusual degree. The cry of distress is in the land of the cotton growers of the South, just as it is in the cotton-manufacturing towns of New England. Last fall and winter the most active interest was exhibited all over the South. There were township meetings, county meetings, State meetings, and interstate meetings.

In these meetings met men who had toiled for a year, who had been frugal, prudent, industrious. Yet, in spite of industry, frugality, and prudence; yes, in spite of the copious bounty of Providence, they found themselves empty-handed in the presence of the abundance they had created under the blessing of heaven. They met to consider the problem of 5-cent cotton and seek a solution.

Exhaustive examination was made by the State cotton growers' convention, which met in the capital of my State in November. Causes and remedies were discussed and sent up to the interstate convention in Atlanta December 14. Here again the whole question was reviewed by a representative body of as earnest men as ever grappled with a great and grave problem.

Their findings were transmitted to the American Cotton Growers' Protective Association, which met in Memphis December 21.

This body reviewed the work of the preceding conventions and promulgated its findings. I have copies of all those findings here, but will not consume the time of the House in reading them.

REMEDIES SUGGESTED.

Suffice it to say that the findings of all these bodies agreed in the main. Briefly stated, the remedies suggested comprised (1) a reduction of the product of raw cotton, in deference to the prevalent impression in "best business" circles that there is an overproduction of cotton; (2) increase of all food crops; (3) diversification of crops; (4) curtailment of credit system; (5) reform of the currency system; (6) abolition of gambling in cotton and all agricultural products.

All these remedies, save the last two, relate to the individual and collective action of the cotton growers themselves, and they have inaugurated the proper steps to make them effective. The last two are beyond the reach of individual effort. They are beyond the reach of State legislation. They can be reached only by national legislation. Having done all in their power to accomplish by organization or State legislation, they come to Congress for relief.

The financial question is effectually tied up here now. There is but one avenue for relief left open for Congressional action at this time—the abolition of gambling in cotton—and to that phase of the matter I shall therefore confine myself.

Mr. Chairman, I attended two of those cotton growers' conventions, and I wish to say that I have never attended meetings pervaded by a more intense and sincere desire to arrive at the true solution. In response to the wishes of these bodies, I introduced a bill which is now pending in the Committee on Agriculture. Several other bills are pending, emanating from different sections of the cotton belt.

HAVE A RIGHT TO BE HEARD.

Since my bill was introduced, Mr. Chairman, I have received thousands of letters, many of them pathetic in their appeals to Congress, indorsing its tenor and urging its passage. From my district alone I have, by actual count, received 1,091 petitions, containing 5,135 individual signatures. I have had petitions from other districts and other States, urging me to press this measure upon the attention of Congress. These people have a right to be heard here. They shall be heard. The responsibility shall be fixed where it belongs. [Applause.]

While, for the sake of brevity, I shall confine myself to dealing in "cotton futures," I state broadly that every condition and conclusion and consequence, applicable to gambling in cotton, will apply to similar operations in the great staple cereals which are made subjects of "future" dealings. I wish to state also that in this discussion I shall not go outside of the official reports of testimony taken before several committees of Congress.

THE CASE STATED.

Mr. Chairman, the man who should advisedly bargain away in the beginning of the year, at a clearly ascertained loss to himself, a whole year's product of toil and privation, would everywhere be adjudged a fool in the assizes of common sense. Still the man would simply have done what he had a right to do with his own.

But when that man presumes, unasked, to bargain away the year's product of another in advance, even if at no cost to that other, the natural and proper feeling would be one of resentment toward him as an impertinent meddler.

If, however, it became clear that this meddler bargained the year's product of another in advance, not once, not twice, but bargained it and sold it time and again at an appreciable cost to the producer, I think it quite likely that violent remedies—probably the toe of a boot—would be applied to the intruder, and a self-respecting public opinion would applaud the vigor of the remedy if not the remedy itself.

That is essentially the relation of the "future" operator to the producer of cotton and other agricultural staples, and that is the proposition that I shall first address myself to. The quality of the act is not one whit changed by reason of its wider application or broader scope. If the act is vicious in its narrower scope, in its operation upon the individual producer, it can not be less vicious, certainly, when operating upon the interests of thousands and millions of producers.

IS THE OPTION DEALER A MEDDLER?

It should be sufficient answer to such inquiry that through all the six thousand years and more of the world's history down to 1872, the world had gotten along without the services of the option dealer, and had gotten along fairly well. Not that we should reject or condemn all innovations, or any innovation, because it is innovation; but the fact that he is an innovation, and apparently an injurious meddler, fixes upon the option dealer the burden of proof, to show a valid excuse, if he may, for his continued toleration by a long-suffering people. He owes his birth to a decade of debauch of public conscience during and subsequent to a period of public war and consequent public plunder. The continued toleration of his superfluous and officious presence is due to the grip acquired upon the public throat during the stupor incident to that mammoth debauch.

But how and why did the option dealer come upon the scene in the first instance? Did he come at the solicitation of the producer? No. Did the consumer ask his intervention? No. Whom does he represent? What are his methods? What useful function does he fulfill?

Hear what the Senate committee, presided over by that able jurist, the late Senator George, of Mississippi, says about it. The most elaborate examination was made and fullest testimony from the ablest representatives of the exchanges and others, pro and con, was obtained. That testimony is printed as a public document, together with findings of the committee upon the facts.

Here is what the committee says as to the option system:

In the first place, let it be noted that only in and through and under the regulations of the two cotton exchanges in New York and New Orleans can this business be transacted. The Cotton Exchange in New York is a corporation under the laws of that State. It is composed of less than 500 members, and the number can not be increased beyond that. The initiation fee is $10,000, and the new members are elected by the old. No man can deal directly in futures unless he is a member.

The corporation has absolute power over the dealings. All disputes or controversies are settled by a court established by the corporation itself, in what is called arbitration proceedings. Neither party is allowed to call in a Federal or State court. It fixes the grades of all cotton, designates the warehouses in which it shall be stored, fixes the fees and charges for storage, weighing, and all other work done in relation to cotton. It fixes the quotations of prices which are to be published to the world, and these quotations are thus fixed under its rules for months for which there are no actual sales.

It and its members have such wealth that it is claimed, in a published letter of one of the principal members made in response to argument made on the floor of this body, that the exchange can absolutely dominate and fix prices, as against all others, by flooding the market with offers of an unlimited supply of futures when at other places prices are, in its opinion, too high, and thus break the market; and, on the other hand, when it deems prices too low at other places, may immediately buy all that can be offered.

The New Orleans Cotton Exchange, though located in the largest spot cotton market this side the Atlantic, is a mere annex to and a subordinate of the New York Cotton Exchange, and so need not be described further than by saying if it had the will to do good it has not the power.

Such are the agencies and localities of these dealings, and they are the sole agencies and places for transacting this business.

That recital of cold fact is the strongest possible arraignment of the dealings and the dealers.

I have examined the testimony page by page—nearly 2,000 pages of it, taken first and last by committees of Congress—and I have compared it with the charter, constitution, by-laws, and rules of the cotton exchange, and in my judgment that indictment is a true bill against the dealings and the dealers upon the cotton exchange.

AN OVERSHADOWING MENACE.

Mr. Chairman, note the admission:

The exchange can absolutely dominate and fix prices, as against all others, by flooding the market with offers of an unlimited supply of futures when at other places prices are, in its opinion, too high, and thus break the market; and, on the other hand, when it deems prices too low at other places, may immediately buy all that can be offered.

That alone presents a condition which Congress should deal with.

When would a gambler think prices too high? When would he think prices too low? The bare possession of such power over a product is an overshadowing menace to prices whether that power were actively exercised or not. Not many industries could sit silent under that overshadowing menace and live.

WILL THAT POWER BE EXERCISED?

Having the power to make or break prices, Mr. Chairman, will the exchange use that power? Ah, ask me whether the water will continue to flow to the sea; as well ask whether the apple thrown into the air will return to the earth. So long as human passion for power, human avarice, human greed, live in the human breast, so surely will the possession of power insure the exercise of that power. Not only will it be exercised, not only is it exercised in its fullest sweep, but note how carefully the exchanges have hedged that power in against all possible interference by the producer and the spinner.

Not only is this absolute power over prices exercised to the farthest limit of its tremendous sweep—the unanswerable proof of its exercise appears in the unbroken policy of depressed prices in the fall and higher prices in the spring. By unlimited offerings in advance of October, November, December, and January futures the prices of contracts for those months are forced down, as already shown. The spot cotton market follows the contract market.

During those months the bulk of the crop passes out of the hands of the producer. It has to be so. Few of them are independent; and under the method of the exchange fewer are independent to-day than were so ten years ago. Their obligations must be met. Then, when the bulk of the crop has passed out of the producers' possession, by reversing their tactics the price is raised. This is notorious. It has been burned into the memory of cotton producers every year since the exchange intruded its superfluous presence.

A SELF-CONTINUING MEDDLER.

This body of option dealers is not only a self-constituted but a self-continuing meddler—not only self-constituted and self-continuing, but so limited in membership as to make the cotton exchange the closest corporation on the face of the earth. Membership is so costly, too, that it becomes a close corporation of fabulous wealth.

Rules are so rigid and penalties so severe that the few master spirits practically wield the whole force of this mighty engine in whatever direction the individual or collective interests of the leaders may lie. And from the verdict of this self-constituted, self-continuing, close corporation, as between its members, no court of justice, Federal or State, can be invoked.

A MONSTER MONOPOLY.

None save the members can deal directly in futures on the exchange. Thus the 454 members of the New York Cotton Exchange are enabled to draw a tribute from every other section of the country and levy a tax upon one of its most important industries. Its rules are so framed as practically to shut the spinner or buyer of actual cotton out of the exchange, even through the medium of a member of that close corporation. This is accomplished through a form of contract which permits the seller of a future contract to deliver any one of thirty-odd grades, and allows the buyer no option as to what grade he shall accept.

The buyer can not contract for any specific grade. He must take anything tendered, from "good ordinary" to "fair." It goes without saying that the spinner, when he buys, wants specific grades, and he must get what he wants for the purposes of his particular line of goods.

Again, the form of contract does not admit of purchase or sale of less than 100 bales. This practically shuts out nine-tenths of the producers of cotton from even the poor chance of protecting themselves through the medium of a member of the exchange.

Probably less than one-tenth of the producers of cotton raise as much as 100 bales. And so it turns out, just as was expected and intended, no doubt, that the two parties principally concerned with actual cotton—the producer and the spinner—are entirely excluded as factors on the exchange.

FIXES THE PRICE ABSOLUTELY.

Hence it comes finally and incontestably to this result: The only two parties directly interested in real cotton being shut out, the exchange is left in the exclusive control of the speculative trader. As already seen, the exchange fixes the price absolutely. The spinner buys his cotton throughout the interior markets directly from the producer; but he buys strictly according to exchange quotations.

If a bear raid on the exchange results in a fall of 10 points or any number of points, the fall is immediately reflected in the office of every spinner, and he promptly wires his country buyer, reducing the limit by just so much. This is a matter that comes within the personal observation and experience of every cotton grower every season, and many times in every season. At first glance it might appear singular that the spinner does not kick at his exclusion from the exchange as a factor in determining the price.

The other party principally concerned has been protesting for years and appealing to Congress for relief; but the buyer of actual cotton has not been heard from. The explanation is easy. The spinner thinks his interest lies in the direction of buying cotton as cheap as possible, and the effect of the exchange methods has been to enable him to buy his raw material cheaper from year to year than he thinks he otherwise would.

This is a silent but eloquent indictment of the exchange system that can not be condoned or overcome. Does any sane man believe that the tremendous financial interests engaged in spinning cotton would have been silent this long had they thought the exchange operated against them? Would they not have been knocking at the doors of Congress with unremitting insistence if they had not thought the exchange was furthering their interests?

RAISES AS WELL AS LOWERS PRICES.

It is admitted by the advocates of the system that prices may be temporarily lowered independent of supply and demand, but it is argued as an offset that they are quite as frequently raised above the normal level of supply and demand. Ah, Mr. Chairman, there is the rub. What right have these people to interfere at all? Is it not clear that they hurt the consumer in the one case as surely as they hurt the producer in the other? The admission and the plea complete the circuit of condemnation from their own mouths. What compensation or comfort is it to us who are forced to sell to-day on a "bear" market, to know that yesterday or to-morrow or next week the "bulls" will be in control? Every seller implies a buyer, does it? Therein lies the culminating iniquity of the thing. They may sell an unlimited quantity; they do sell it; then they move heaven and earth to beat down the price in order that they may buy back their contracts at a profit to themselves—and the price of spot cotton goes down, down with even pace.

No, Mr. Chairman, the people of America, both producers and consumers, are entitled to a free, untrammeled market. Nothing short of that will satisfy them.

PRICES PROGRESSIVELY LOWER.

But we are not left solely to induction or inference. By consulting the table of surplus and prices appended, it is demonstrated that the general trend of prices has been toward a lower level. Not only so, but the price has moved up and down independent of supply and demand. The surplus is used as a basis of comparison here, because, in my judgment, it expresses more accurately the relation between actual supply and actual demand. Here are a few striking contradictions to the law of supply and demand as revealed by these tables.

Of the crop of 1871–72 there remained at the end of the season four months' supply of cotton. The average price was 21.88 cents. At the end of the season of 1887–88 only three weeks' supply of cotton remained on hand. Had the new crop been delayed four weeks the mills must have stopped running. Yet the price was only 5.66 cents. The general decline in all values during this period, due to vicious financial legislation, was about 33½ per cent. Deducting what should be due to the financial factor, we would still have the difference between 14½ cents and 5½ cents to be accounted for by supply and demand. This law would require the higher price with the smaller supply. But the fact is just the reverse.

Note this point carefully—with a surplus equal to four months' supply, the price was 21.88 cents. With a surplus equal to only three weeks' supply the price was forced down to 5½ cents. That is the law of supply and demand, is it? Certainly it is not the law of supply and demand for real cotton. Starting from this same point of time—1871–72—with four months' supply and the price 21.88 cents, compare 1891–92. In the latter year there were less than three months' supply, yet the price was run down to 4.18 cents. If we had to reckon with the financial factor alone, the price of cotton the latter year should have been not less than 12 cents.

At the end of the season of 1889–90, the surplus on hand had increased to five weeks' supply. Did the price decrease correspondingly? Not a bit of it. That is what should have happened if the law of demand and supply had not been interfered with. On the contrary, however, the price, instead of decreasing, increased to 6.18 cents.

Take the current year, if you please. Reckon out the effect of the financial factor; reckon out the effect of the probable surplus; reckon out every other legitimate factor—and what should the price be to-day? Reckoning out all these disturbing factors under well-ascertained laws of economics, cotton should be bringing at least 8½ cents. What is it really bringing? From 5 to 5½ cents. The difference between the actual price and the price as it should be, reckoning out all the factors except the gambling factor, and you must have the effect of the gambling factor. It can't be otherwise. This difference is 3½ cents. If this reasoning be correct (and I challenge refutation), it must be that the farmer is getting 3 to 3½ cents less for cotton to-day by reason of the gambling in cotton futures. How long will the American cotton grower stand it? Only so long as he will organize and demand a remedy.

The tables inserted below are compiled from the statistics of Allison & Co., cotton experts, and contain abundant evidence of the same sort.

NOT DUE TO FOREIGN COMPETITION.

Ah, but they tell us the downward tendency of prices is due to increased competition of other countries that raise cotton more cheaply than we can. The principal trouble with this explanation consists in its stating as a fact what is not a fact. In 1872 the United States produced 55 per cent of the cotton of the world; in 1895 we produced 84½ per cent.

See table appended showing relative cotton production of the United States and other countries from 1865 to 1895.

NOT SO WITH TOBACCO AND WOOL.

In striking contrast with the condition of these products which are subject to option dealings is the range of prices on tobacco, wool, and other products which do not figure on the exchange boards.

The prices of wool are subject to fluctuation from tariff laws and seasons; yet the highest average price of coarse wool since 1878 is 34 cents; the lowest is 29 cents.

The highest average price of tobacco since 1878 is 9.9 cents; the lowest is 7.7 cents. The prices of these commodities being exempt from the officious interference of the exchange gamblers, show nothing like the fluctuations that have confounded the cotton and grain growers, nor do they show the progressive downward trend that threatens the cotton and grain growers with destruction.

WHO FOOTS THE BILLS?

In almost every other industry the initial step in arriving at the selling price of a product is the cost of production, including cost of raw material, labor, insurance, storage, etc. Add to this the cost of transportation to a given point and you obtain the selling price at that point. By the ingenious operations of the cotton exchange and of the grain exchanges this rule is precisely reversed.

In normal conditions all the charges for insurance, commissions, storage, and freight would be carried with the first cost and paid by the consumer. The selling price of cotton, however, being fixed on the New York Cotton Exchange absolutely and exclusively, months in advance, before the product has passed the initial stage of production, without any regard for the cost of production, all the expense is adroitly shifted upon the producer.

This is the way of it: The price fixed by the New York exchange is the price in New York, and that is the standard absolutely followed by spinners, purchasers of actual cotton, as we have already seen. The price in New York being fixed, naturally and necessarily the price at any given interior market is obtained by deducting the cost of transportation, insurance, storage, and commission. Thus the natural and universal course of commerce is nullified, pushed aside, reversed, and the entire cost of handling is saddled upon the back of the producer.

If demonstration were necessary, it could be easily furnished. But it is not necessary to prove that which is admitted by the leading exponent of the system. At page 137 of the hearings before the Hatch committee in the Fifty-second Congress, Mr. Bloss, vice-president of the New York Cotton Exchange, was finally pinned down, after a good deal of sparring, to answering this question: Whether ultimately all these commissions for the wind sales did not come out of the crop? The answer of Mr. Bloss was, "Yes; they are obliged to." And these commissions range from 2 to 12½ cents per bale.

Thus by a system of gratuitous and officious, not to say criminal, interference the entire cost of handling, instead of being carried in the final cost to the consumer or divided between consumer and producer, is shifted wholly upon the producer.

Not only so. This officious intermeddler, by means of ingeniously devised rules, retains absolute control of every item of cost. He fixes the grades and the prices. He prescribes charges for storage and at what warehouses storage shall be permitted. He fixes the rules and the rates of pay for inspection, weighing, and, in short, every detail of every item of cost. Then he sums it all up and saddles it upon the producer. The same is true in every particular of the staple grain-growing industry.

Mr. Chairman, the patience of the American farmer surpasses that of the proverbial Job. It passes belief, if he has fully appreciated his wrongs and his burdens. Imagine the pig-iron interests subjected to such! Would they not be promptly heard here? What interest or industry would be so patient?

Why, Mr. Chairman, the great railroad systems of this country, which maintain costly lobbies here about this Capitol and who yearly pull the leg of the Government to the tune of $35,000,000 for service that they would charge less than $5,000,000 for if performed for any of the big corporations—these railroads are here raising a big howl for relief. They want it bad and want it right away. Relief? From what? Is some big exchange selling contracts for future transportation at ruinous rates to the railroads? Not at all. What then?

Why, Mr. Chairman, a few little pesky ticket brokers are corrupting public morals and tempting the cupidity of dishonest railroad employees by buying and selling actual transportation contracts uttered and sold by the railroads themselves, for which the railroads already have the money. It is claimed that forgery and false impersonation occur, but are the railroads the sole sufferers from forgery? Why should they have special legislation to protect them from perjury and forgery and false personation? What have they done, what great service to the Government, that they should be taken better care of than other people?

If we are to judge of the future by the past, the puny little ticket broker will be wiped out by this House in order that this great moral institution, the railroad, may go forward upon its high moral mission. But the people of nine States who grow cotton, and of the Western States, growing grain, will watch with interest the action of the Congress on that bill to remove an obstacle out of the way of railroad business.

The growers of cotton and growers of grain have been clamoring here for years. There are several bills pending in committees of this House. Every consideration of good morals hypocritically put forward by the railroads to forward their bill, applies in fact a thousandfold to the infamous interference of the exchanges with the cotton and grain growers' interests.

Has not the cotton exchange disturbed the orderly conduct of the business of my people? Has it not cut down their profits? Has it not inflamed the gambling instinct in men, until, infatuated by gains or maddened by losses, they have run the whole gamut of crime, ending with the culminating crime of all—a crashing bullet into a crazed brain by a dishonored hand?

In the name of morals, in the name of fair dealing, in the name of common honesty, the farmers demand this relief. [Applause.]

FRAUD OR GAMBLING—WHICH?

But, Mr. Chairman, it is claimed that these contracts are bona fide: that deliveries may be demanded. The conclusive answer to this is that deliveries are not made, and delivery is not contemplated. As an absolute demonstration of this, compare receipts at New York and New Orleans, respectively, with the operations in futures at those points.

In 1896 the total receipts at New York were 168,000 bales. The sales of "futures" footed up 56,000,000 bales. At New Orleans the same year total receipts were 864,000 bales, and the sales of futures amounted to 15,498,700 bales. The entire crop of that year was only 7,147,000 bales, 4,627,000 of which were exported and 2,505,000 used by domestic mills.

CAN NOT BE DONE.

What do these figures mean? Fifty-six and a half million bales sold against a total receipt of 168,000 in New York! Seventy million bales of recorded contracts (and the Omniscient only knows how many were not recorded) sold against total receipts of less than 1,000,000! How could deliveries of 70,000,000 bales be made with 1,000,000?

It is gigantic fraud or gigantic gambling—gambling beside which the wildest orgies of Monte Carlo are tame. This can mean only one of two things. Either the 69,000,000 bales sold in excess of receipts were gambling contracts pure and simple, or else those receipts were sold over and over again sixty-nine times. Looking at it another way, the whole crop was sold by these intermeddlers in advance, and sold ten times over. For what? For the fun of the thing? Hardly. What for, then? Every time a bale of cotton was sold there was a commission to the broker of from 2 to 12½ cents.

There is the milk in the cocoanut. I am inclined to think, too, that insurance charges, storage charges, inspection and weighing charges, are also carried in each transaction, though, of course, none of them are paid by the broker, and they go to swell his part of the "swag." And mark you, under their method, the expense, whatever it is, comes out of the crop; that is, out of the producer. This is admitted again and again by exchange experts, more or less unwillingly. It needs no proof. It is too plain for argument. Somebody has to pay. It must come out of somebody. Out of whom? Under the system it comes inevitably out of the producer.

Mr. Chairman, if these are gambling contracts, it goes without saying they ought to be suppressed. If they are fraudulent multiplications of wind sales for the purpose of multiplying commissions and other charges, they are an insufferable incubus upon legitimate trade.

WHO ARE BUSINESS MEN?

But they tell us, Mr. Chairman, this system has become so interlocked with the whole commerce of real cotton, interstate and foreign, that the destruction of the system would disorganize and demoralize the business interests of the country. What business interests, Mr. Chairman? Away with this arrogant and unwarranted assumption that the gambling interests are the only, or even the best, business interests in this country.

Are not the farmers business men? Is not their business disorganized and demoralized by the intermeddling operations of the exchanges? Are they not entitled to some protection? Why, according to these people, the men who professionally gamble in a $300,000,000 crop are the "best business" men, while the men who make that crop, who create that value, are not. Arrogance! Rot!

SCOTCH THIS SNAKE.

Finally, it is urged by the advocates of the system that if we legislate them out of existence on this side the Atlantic it will result in transferring the entire trading in futures to the other side.

They darkly hint that we should surely be fleeced in that event. There is absolutely nothing in the history of these human sharks on the New York Cotton Exchange to inspire us with confidence in their fostering care over the cotton growers. Our observation is that gamblers on both sides the water are very much the same. If I am to be sandbagged and robbed, I fail to see any comfort to me in the nationality of the robber who does the job. It is quite clear to me, however, that if the seventy-odd million bales of wind cotton sold in this country could be eliminated there would undoubtedly be that much less burden upon the actual business in actual cotton. We scotch the snake we can not kill.

HAS CONGRESS JURISDICTION?

This seems too elementary for argument. Beyond question the commodities affected by the exchange operations are articles of interstate commerce to a very large extent, and nearly three-fifths of them being exported, relate to foreign commerce. The exchanges assume to fix prices for these products, which are subjects of interstate commerce. They assume to interfere with and regulate interstate and foreign commerce, which, under the Federal Constitution, is the exclusive prerogative of Congress. These intermeddling exchanges arrogate and are exercising a power that is denied to a sovereign State.

But it is not necessary to invoke the interstate-commerce feature of these transactions to determine the right of Congress to interpose.

The Congress has taken cognizance of this matter. Twice such legislation has passed the House, and the legitimacy of such action has been sustained by some of the ablest jurists within and without the Halls of Congress. The moral aspects alone would warrant the interference of Congress.

WHAT ACTION?

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the difficulties surrounding this phase of the question. I do not hesitate to say, however, that in my judgment any one of the several bills now pending would accomplish the end in view. Naturally I prefer the one introduced by myself, which at some future time I hope to discuss in detail before the House.

As a matter of interest and suggestion, however, I ask leave to print herewith extracts from our consular reports, showing what steps have been taken in some foreign countries to emancipate their agricultural producers from the shackles of this gratuitous and crushing intermeddler. Shall America, with a larger proportion of farming interests and farming population than any European nation, refuse to care for those interests? I trust not. I believe not.

GERMAN LAW AGAINST EXCHANGE SPECULATION.

[Consular Report No. 194, page 447.]

Germany, under the pressure of the Agrarian party, has undertaken what other nations have been desirous of doing, viz, to check speculation on the exchanges, not alone in stocks, but also in food products, principally grain.

(1) No exchange can be established without the consent of the Government, which, through a commissioner, will exercise a continued supervision over its actions and dealings.

(2) A court of honor is created which may exclude persons from the exchange after due trial. Parties who have been judicially declared bankrupt will be excluded for at least six months, and permanently if the bankruptcy was fraudulent.

(3) When the listing of stocks or bonds is applied for at the exchange, a committee will make a thorough investigation of all circumstances affecting their security and desirability, and will then decide whether they can be admitted. Before this is done a prospectus must be published giving all particulars of such securities. Stocks will not be admitted until one year after the entry of the firm name in the commercial register nor before the publication of the balance sheet for the first business year. All parties who have signed the prospectus are legally liable for the correctness of the statements in the same and must make good any loss or damage to the takers of such securities resulting from false, misleading, or omitted statements in the prospectus. Besides, they are liable to be criminally prosecuted if the circumstances warrant such proceedings.

(4) All dealings in futures or on term at the exchange are prohibited, unless the parties to the transaction are entered in the so-called exchange register. The original entry in this register costs 150 marks ($35.70), and an annual fee of 25 marks ($5.95) is exacted to keep the entry alive. The register is public, and can be inspected by any person. The entries are at once published in the Imperial Gazette (Reichsanzeiger) and the local official papers, at the expense of the parties, and a compilation of all names will be published once a year in the Imperial Gazette. The persons omitting to have their names entered in the exchange register have no legal claims against each other by reason of term transactions. Such claims are considered in the light of gambling debts.

(5) The term business of dealing in futures in grain and mill products or stocks of mining and manufacturing establishments on the exchange is entirely forbidden.

(6) Whoever habitually, or for selfish purposes, induces inexperienced persons to speculate on the exchange in such articles as are outside of their sphere of business will be punished by imprisonment and a money fine of 15,000 marks ($3,570).

(7) With the exception of the paragraph referring to the exchange registers, which became operative in November 1, 1896, this law went into effect on January 1, 1897. (For full text of the German statute see Consular Report No. 196, page 296.)

EXHIBIT E.

GRAIN EXCHANGE BROKERS OF RUSSIA.

[Consular Report No. 95, page 609.]

There are fifteen brokers at the grain exchange of St. Peterburg, who are elected by the Grain Exchange Society, and confirmed by the department of trade and manufactures. Of these one is appointed by the exchange committee as a chief broker. The number of the brokers can be increased or decreased by the action of the Grain Exchange Society, with the confirmation of minister of finance. A person wishing to be an exchange broker must file a petition with the grain exchange committee with the following proofs: (1) That he is a Russian subject; (2) that he is not less than 25 years old; (3) that he is a member of the grain exchange; and (4) in case he went through a bankruptcy, to present a certificate that his bankruptcy was acknowledged by the commercial court as justified, i. e., caused by unforeseen misfortune.

The persons elected for exchange brokers are examined by an exchange committee as to their qualifications. The committee then sends all the documents presented and their own conclusions to the department of trade and manufactures. An exchange broker enters upon the duties of his office after his confirmation by the department of trade and manufactures, after taking the oath of his office; but if within thirty days of his qualification, he should fail to present to the committee of the Grain Exchange Society all the documents and books necessary for his duty as broker prescribed by law, his place is declared vacant and given to the next one.

A vacancy occurring in the course of a year is filled, with permission of the department of trade and manufactures, by election held in the general assembly of the Grain Exchange Society. The brokers are appointed for an indefinite period. They must provide themselves with a commercial certificate of second guild; and although they have to pay for the same and all other fees established, they can not engage in any other business outside of that of broker. They must be acquainted with all the rules and regulations concerning commerce and with the prices and qualities of goods. In the discharge of their duties, the following rules must be observed:

(1) Brokers are not allowed to act as commercial attorneys, trustees, or clerks.

(2) They are prohibited from forming associations among themselves or performing the official duties of another, except with the permission of the trustees. They can cooperate for a united mediatorship in carrying out separate orders.

(3) They must attend to their duties personally, and are not allowed to conclude any bargain through an assistant.

(4) They are bound to keep secret all orders, negotiations, and contracts concluded through their agency, except in such cases where it is allowed by their trustees or by the character of the bargain itself.

(5) The brokers in their certificates to parties must designate the bargains in poods (weights) and copecks (values). They issue also brokers' certificates for either sale or purchase of goods, according to orders received by letter or telegram from members of the exchange living in other cities or towns, but they must send such certificates for signatures of the parties.

The brokers must be present at the exchange during business hours and wear a badge with the inscription, "Exchange broker." Each grain-exchange broker receives every year from the department of trade and manufactures a book under seal, in which he must record all bargains made according to the certificate issued by him, with all the particulars and details on the day they were made, and not later than the following morning.

The department of trade and manufactures gives such book only when the broker produces a certificate that he has paid the guild duties for the year, and when he has received the book he must present it to the court of exchequer to have it stamped with revenue stamps. These books and the brokers' certificates issued must be kept in strict conformity with the commercial statute. All bargains being considered secret, the brokers can issue copies of the certificates only to parties interested, and if called on by the courts he is not obliged to produce his book, but a copy under seal is sufficient. At the end of each year, not later than January 20, or when discharged or at the death of a broker, the book is delivered and kept in the safe of the archives in the department of trade and manufactures.

The duty of the chief broker is to see that all the rules and regulations are observed by the exchange brokers; to collect from them information concerning the prices of goods sold and bought at the exchange; to see that all forms under the supervision of the exchange committee are carried out and bulletins published, for the correctness of which he is responsible.

In case of neglect of duty or nonqualification of any broker, the committee of the Grain Exchange Society has the right to ask the minister of finance for the discharge of such broker without petition.

The compensation of the brokers or the brokerage due from the buyer and seller is fixed at the following rate: For the first 10,000 rubles, one-half of 1 per cent, and for amounts above 10,000 rubles, one-fourth of 1 per cent from each party. The brokers are permitted to make reductions of their own accord, if they so desire.

JOHN KAREL, Consul-General.

Mr. JENKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. HANDY. I yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. OTEY], and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] yields him ten minutes, making twenty minutes.

Mr. JENKINS. That is correct.

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Chairman, I shall endeavor to confine my remarks to the bill now before the House, as no one has referred to it so far. [Laughter.] And so, in considering this railroad bill, I desire to say that this House is practically without any detailed official information which in my opinion enables it at this moment to act promptly and discreetly, decisively and patriotically, on the Cuban question. [Laughter.]

This essential information will not be given us until the Committee on Foreign Affairs sees fit to do so.

In the meantime, Mr. Chairman, that side of the Chamber—the majority of this body—will, in my opinion, do absolutely nothing. [Applause.] What I will do when all the facts are before us—what course I will pursue when we are possessed of the knowledge now in possession of the Foreign Affairs Committee, I can not now say. But I do not believe that there is a member of this body who, when the supreme hour comes, will shirk his duty to his country—aye, to his God. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, the question then will be, What is his duty? [Laughter.]

In his novel, The Fair God, Gen. Lew Wallace, a gallant Federal officer, puts into the mouth of Itzell, the Tezcucan warrior, the following words, as he addressed Montezuma:

> I intend my words to be respectful, mighty King. A common wisdom teaches us to respect the brave man and dread the coward. * * * A throne may be laid amid hymns and prayers, but to endure it must rest on the allegiance of love.

The scene witnessed on this floor a few days ago, when with unprecedented unanimity this body voted $50,000,000 as an emergency fund, was, to my mind, one that touched the American heart as no other scene has in the last third of a century; and with that fresh in my memory, and in view of the grave and solemn responsibility which we must very soon meet, it is, I hope, not out of place in me to speak, from a Virginian standpoint, as a Southern man, as a former rebel soldier, and to raise my voice in commendation of the brave, to ignore the coward, and to manifest my great joy at the testimony already given by this body that the foundation of our great Republic rests on the allegiance of love. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman—

> The drying up a single tear has more
> Of honest fame, than shedding seas of gore.

And I am sure there is not a patriot on this floor who would not prefer peace to war.

In the language of Tennyson, we would all prefer to extend our dominion of peace—

> Till the war drum throbb'd no longer, and the battle flags were furl'd
> In the parliament of man, the federation of the world.

But, Mr. Chairman, events have been crowded upon us, and I fear that we have exhausted all demands on patriotic patience and forbearance, on justice and on humanity. It appears to me that the time for diplomacy has passed, and that the time for action, as grave and as serious as it is, is upon us [applause], Mr. Chairman.

War is a cruel monster. It is the desolator and destroyer of homes and happiness. Its course is marked by the silent sentinels of devastation, standing amid the sighs of widows and the tears of orphans.

The splendor of our nation may dazzle us, but we have only to look back upon the ruins of Babylon, Carthage, and Rome to show us that war corrupts, enervates, and destroys nations, while peace is the great conservator of power, of happiness, of civil and religious liberty.

My voice and my pen have been for peace, and I am still for peace, if war can be averted with honor. [Applause.]

War is a mad game, at which the rich will play to profit by it. It enriches the few and bleeds the millions. We have forty-five stars, representing forty-five States, each an empire within itself, and within our borders there are others asking to be added to this glorious constellation and appealing in vain, while some look with eagerness to adding the lone star of Cuba.

We have the greatest and most continuous and most unsevered empire of civilized, enlightened, and progressive people on earth, and the real development of our resources has hardly yet begun.

Four-fifths of our arable land are not yet under cultivation and a still larger proportion of our mineral wealth is undeveloped, and there is no limit to our manufactures except the needs of the world. We are untrammeled by the enervating effect of a large standing army.

There is room in one State (Texas) for over 50,000,000 of people, and so far from population being then as dense as it is to-day in England, there would be sufficient fertile land on which to raise all the cotton used in the world and to supply the entire food product necessary for the United States of America. Our streams penetrate all sections of our land, laden with our domestic commerce, giving more miles of navigation than the whole of Europe. We have more railroads than the balance of the world combined, and if projected on a single track would reach from here to the moon.

We of the South know something of the ravages of war; our brethren of the North do not know, for they have never experienced it. And if war come, we of the South know that we have nothing to gain in a commercial way—we have everything to lose. Every man taken from our producing capacity will lessen our material advancement. A generation has passed away since our great struggle, and yet we of the South have not yet recovered from its blighting effects. Our Southland, which to-day should be blossoming like a rose, is yet in the midst of suffering.

No people have ever manifested such manhood and courage in adversity, no people have ever had to fight uphill as they have, and none have ever merited triumph more; and now, as light begins to penetrate the long night of our discomfiture, we ought to hesitate to go to war as long as peace, with honor, is possible. Our martial fervor will be no less emphatic, our patriotic zeal will be no less pronounced, if war must come.

But we will face it as we have always done, yet knowing that it means more taxes, more oppression, more pensions, more privileged classes, more misery and less happiness, more concentration of power in the hands of the few—all for what? To preserve untarnished the honor of our country, to avenge the death of our citizens. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, the destruction of the battle ship Maine has

> Deposited upon the silent shore
> Of memory images and precious thoughts
> That shall not die, and can not be destroyed.

The diplomacy of Spain will now perhaps be in vain. In the future (if war must come) it will be your joy to recall, and your children and your children's children will be proud to read in the history of their country, that you met the issue as Americans. It will be the pride of posterity to know that you promoted and protected the honor of their great country. It will honor you for the step which perhaps you are soon to take. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I may be pardoned for some reflections and observation which may interest the young men who are to fight the battles of our country. The proud and awful names of Grant and Lee may well be coupled together, having been left to us as lights for after times. A third of a century ago, in this very month, after a prolonged and bloody civil strife, we of the South laid down our arms. To have doubted our courage, endurance, prowess, self-abnegation, would have been to belittle these very virtues in the gallant soldiers who overcame us.

Greatness consists in the achievement of great deeds, and who will deny that our brothers in blue achieved them? To underestimate them would be to underrate ourselves. A victory won without struggle is won without merit; then so much the greater honor to the victor who must struggle to accomplish it. No greater tribute can be paid to the military renown of the Northern generals than the admission of great military qualities of those who surrendered to them.

To say that Lee, Jackson, and Stewart were great military leaders and had no superiors adds luster to the American name, and but sheds greater splendor on the renown of Grant, Sherman, and Thomas. To admit that Pickett's charge at Gettysburg was equaled by no charge of modern times, but adds glory to the brave men that withstood and repulsed it. [Applause.]

History records no such defense as that of Fort Sumter, which only adds fame to the navy that reduced it. [Applause.]

Miltiades, freedom's best and bravest friend, was the greatest of generals, and yet he did not disparage the courage and the fame of Datis and his Persian army. Had he done so he would have dimmed his own luster and lessened the splendor of his great achievements and deprived his gallant men of the immortal name justly earned by them on the field of Marathon over two thousand years ago.

If you treat the military renown of Cornwallis and Burgoyne with contempt, you sully the glory of Washington. Wellington would be shorn of his laurels but for the admitted greatness of Napoleon. General Grant might have received the surrender of a million Chinese and it would not have added one-thousandth part of the luster to his name as did the surrender of Robert E. Lee at Appomattox. [Applause.] While St. Helena is a blot on the name and fame of Wellington, Appomattox is the brightest gem in the crown of U. S. Grant. [Applause.]

His great achievement was equaled only by his magnanimity. He spoke of us before the surrender at Appomattox as we are now spoken of by all men. When at Vicksburg, he wrote General Pemberton:

> Men who have shown so much endurance and courage as those under your command in Vicksburg will challenge the respect of any adversary.

He knew them as it was expressed by Charles Francis Adams when he was minister to England, as related by my friend Mr. LACEY of Iowa, in an address made last May, at the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic at Des Moines. After the first battle of Manassas, Mr. Adams was at a reception when the news of the Confederate victory was first announced. A courtier said tauntingly to Mr. Adams: "These Confederates fight well, at any rate." "Yes," said Mr. Adams, "of course they do, sir; they are my countrymen." [Applause.] Gen. U. S. Grant felt and recognized this. After the fall of Richmond he declined to enter it in triumph or even without pomp and parade, and when asked to do so said:

> No, I do not care to go. These people feel too keenly already the injury of war, and I do not intend, even by my presence, to seem to them as one who finds pleasure in viewing the wreck of their beloved capital and country.

So, too, when he was at Atlanta and was asked to ride over the fields that marked his triumphs, he said:

> I can not bear to go and view these fields where so many heroes on both sides have fallen.

Mr. Speaker, this honored American said, "Let us have peace," and my voice would echo his words to-day if there was such a thing with honor. The clouds of prejudice necessarily engendered by our civil strife have now happily given way to the bright sunshine of magnanimity and good feeling.

In view of the impending war, it is, I hope, not asking too much that I may

> Wet with unseen tears
> Those graves of memory where sleep

those of glorious deeds who fought in 1861–1865, in order that those who are to follow on other fields may be stimulated to emulate their example.

In doing so I shall refer to some records which can not be equaled for heroism and matchless courage and may prove a useful lesson to our young men who to-day are stirred with commendable martial fervor and laudable patriotic zeal.

I want our young men to study the history of the four years, 1861 to 1865. Without being invidious, I shall call attention to some examples of heroism which may be useful lessons to them in this day and generation. History records no such loss as is recorded of the Twenty-sixth North Carolina at Gettysburg of 87 per cent, and the First Minnesota on the same field of 82 per cent, and it is simply one of the many pages emblazoned with American valor, audacity, and courage. [Applause.] When we see the First Texas holding its position at Antietam with a loss of 82 per cent, and the First Massachusetts standing firm under a loss of 68 per cent, no man can doubt how the sons of these men will stand together now.

When the One hundred and first New York at Manassas, in changing its position in good order, sustained a loss of 74 per cent, and the Twenty-first Georgia followed the movement with a depletion of 76 per cent; when at Shiloh the Ninth Illinois was immovable under a fire that placed 63 per cent of its men hors de combat, while only a few hundred feet in its front stood the Sixth Mississippi, sustaining a loss of 70 per cent; when the One hundred and fifty-first Pennsylvania inflicted a loss of 708 on the Twenty-first North Carolina, itself sustaining a loss of 355 of its own men, no one can doubt that immortality is written on the name of the American soldier. No one will doubt that to-day, joined together in the same cause under the same flag, the sons of those who fought for as well as of those who fought against the Stars and Stripes in 1861–1865 will be invincible, whether on land or sea, and Spain would do well to beware of them. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, your son or your grandson will read or perhaps has read of when you participated in the bloody charge at Cold Harbor; or the heroism you displayed at the bloody angle at Spottsylvania; or how you scaled the rocky cliffs of Lookout Mountain. And yet on the same page he will read how another grandfather (for his mother, perhaps, was the daughter of a rebel like myself) was in the forefront of Pickett's charge at Gettysburg, at which the whole world stood spellbound in admiration; or perhaps he was one of those who made the name of the American soldier immortal by his participation in the defense of Fort Sumter. Will the grandson think less of his grandfather that wore the gray than of the one that wore the blue? [Applause.] Some of you may have daughters who perhaps have married the sons of a gallant rebel (and I like the name rebel, for I was one myself). [Laughter.]

Should the son of the veteran of the First Minnesota marry the daughter of the veteran of the First Texas, or vice versa, their children would boast that they had a grandfather in each regiment, both renowned for their fighting qualities, the one having lost 82 per cent at Gettysburg, and the other 82 per cent at Antietam. The grandson of a veteran of the One hundred and first New York will ever be proud that his paternal grandfather belonged to that splendid regiment, while he would look with equal pride on the page of history that recorded the gallant deeds of the Twenty-first Georgia, in which, perchance, his maternal grandfather fought, each regiment having lost 76 out of every 100 of their men on the historic field of Manassas.

I think it a useful lesson to call attention to these things. Let us look at the losses here tabulated, and then ask if it does not make every American heart throb with pride, and whether these figures of themselves do not give assurance of the invincibility of the American soldier of to-day. Here are a few instances of losses in Confederate and Federal regiments during the war:

FEDERAL.

Name of regiment.	Battle.	Loss.
		Per cent.
First Minnesota	Gettysburg	82
One hundred and forty-first Pennsylvania	do	76
One hundred and first New York	Manassas	74
Twenty-fifth Massachusetts	Cold Harbor	70
Thirty-sixth Wisconsin	Bethesda Church	69
Eighth Vermont	Cedar Creek	68
Twenty-fourth Michigan	Gettysburg	64
Fifth New Hampshire	Fredericksburg	64

CONFEDERATE.

Name of regiment.	Battle.	Loss.
		Per cent.
Twenty-sixth North Carolina	Gettysburg	87
Twenty-first Georgia	Manassas	76
Twenty-sixth North Carolina	Gettysburg	72
Sixth Mississippi	Shiloh	71
Eighth Tennessee	Stone River	68
Palmetto Sharpshooters, South Carolina	Glendale	68
First Alabama Battalion	Chickamauga	65
First Texas	Antietam	82

Posterity will be gladdened when they read that the sons of such heroes joined together to sustain the honor and dignity of their great nation. And to-day as we look at the flag of our common country, and as we recognize that the honor of the nation is threatened, the sons of the boys who wore the blue and those of the boys who wore the gray will salute it and join us as we say to that flag, in the language of Ruth:

> Whither thou goest we will go; where thou lodgest we will lodge; thy people shall be our people, and thy God shall be our God. Where thou diest we will die and there will we be buried.

[Long and continued applause.]

Mr. OTEY. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Chairman, owing to the interruptions of the speakers, the time has been cut short, and I ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken at ten minutes of 5, instead of quarter of 5.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Delaware? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, what is the request?

The CHAIRMAN. That the vote be taken at ten minutes of 5, instead of quarter of 5.

Mr. PAYNE. In view of the fact that objection was made to the extension of the time of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], I think I shall object.

Mr. HANDY. What is the gentleman's objection?

Mr. PAYNE. You objected to the extension of the time of the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HANDY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I made no objection. The interruptions were taken out of his time. He had the full thirty minutes, and that is where it affects us. Now, this request is only to take the vote five minutes later.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] was cut off because the gentleman from Delaware objected.

Mr. HANDY. Oh, no; the RECORD will not show that.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. HANDY. Was not the time extended, Mr. Chairman, before the objection was made by the gentleman from New York?

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps the announcement was made, but the gentleman from New York, as soon as he learned what the request was, made the objection, and the Chair felt it was his duty to recognize the objection.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama (to Mr. HANDY). Can not you ask now for an extension, and perhaps the gentleman from New York will withdraw his objection.

Mr. HANDY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I yield seventeen minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the gentleman has only thirteen minutes remaining.

Mr. HANDY. Well, I will yield all my time, which is surely fourteen minutes by the clock, to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I desire to correct a mistake that was made here on last Thursday when the statement was made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] that John J. McCook was a very bad man and was undertaking the negotiation of four hundred millions of bonds of Cuba, and was against the Administration, and so on, and so on. Now, I read in the Washington Post of the 9th a statement made by Treasurer Rubens, of the Cuban junta, that John J. McCook had no connection whatever with the junta, nor had he negotiated any Cuban bonds. He also denied the sale or issue of four hundred millions of bonds, and further stated that only $100,000 of Cuban bonds had been negotiated, and those were sold at 40 cents on the dollar.

Let me call the attention of this House and the country to a startling statement that appeared on the first page of the Washington Post, an Administration paper, in its issue of Sunday morning, the 10th instant:

MINISTER POLO INFORMED—A MIDNIGHT CONFERENCE AT THE HOME OF SENATOR ELKINS.

The President spent last evening discussing with his personal friends the latest development in the Spanish situation. Among those present during the consultation was John J. McCook, of New York, who is largely interested in the Cuban bond and purchase proposition, and who spent several hours in the President's company.

Another visitor was Senator ELKINS, who was summoned to the White House, and who left a dinner party at his own house to be with the President.

After leaving the White House, where the Woodford dispatch was discussed, Senator ELKINS returned to his residence, and was shortly afterwards joined there by Señor Polo y Bernabe, the Spanish minister. Senator ELKINS and his visitor remained in close consultation until nearly midnight.

From this it appears that this same wicked McCook seems to have a closer connection with this Administration than the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] who abused McCook and pretended to speak for the Administration last Thursday.

I read again from the Washington Post of Sunday morning, which announced the policy of the Administration to be presented to us on Monday morning in the President's message, and I will read from the message a little later on and in connection with all this that part of the Post's article showing its close connection with the Administration. It says:

The Post can officially announce this morning that the receipt of the information regarding the armistice will not change the President's policy. This fact was stated positively at the White House last night. The message will be transmitted to Congress to-morrow. It will recommend immediate armed intervention.

There were rumors last night that the President would change his message in view of the new developments. The Post has the highest authority—there could be none higher, in fact—for asserting that these rumors affecting the President's stability of purpose and patriotic desire have no foundation in fact.

For this reason no credence is placed in the assertion that the President is willing to accept the Spanish armistice coupled with the much-discussed purchase scheme, or that he has any other idea in view than the withdrawal of the Spanish flag from the Island of Cuba.

It is true that the semiofficial press dispatches from Madrid have all the time insisted that the absolute and complete independence of the Cuban people has never been demanded by the United States of Spain, but these announcements, emanating from Spanish sources, have placed the President in a false and embarrassing position. It is again asserted in the Post, and with ample authority, that the withdrawal of Spain from the island is the main issue upon which the President's policy is based, and he will be satisfied with nothing less.

The Post can officially announce this morning that the receipt of the news regarding the armistice will not change the President's policy. It will recommend immediate armed intervention.

But the Administration took another change overnight. It had an interview with Senator ELKINS and John J. McCook, and at midnight "Senator ELKINS and the Spanish minister were in close consultation;" and then on Monday morning we have a message which omits all reference to "immediate armed intervention."

I have been accused of attacking the President of the United States. I never made a remark about his personality or about him individually, but as President of the United States. I affirm now, as I have repeatedly affirmed, that he has no policy. He does not know now what he wants to do. He does not know how to do what ought to be done in this case. I propose to show him how, before I finish, by reading from a resolution of the largest Grand Army post in the State of New Jersey, which has mapped out the policy that this country ought to pursue. They know what the people of this country want and what the people of this country demand.

We are told by those highest in authority on Sunday morning that we shall have a demand for immediate intervention; and then comes this message on Monday saying:

Yesterday official information was received by me that the latest decree of the Queen Regent of Spain directs General Blanco, in order to prepare and facilitate peace, to proclaim a suspension of hostilities.

Now they say that hostilities have been suspended; and in the same message the President says:

In view of these facts—

Which he had recited—

I ask Congress to authorize and empower the President to take measures to secure a full and final termination of hostilities between the Government of Spain and the people of Cuba and to secure in the island—

What? The independence of the Cuban patriots? No—

Secure in the island—

What? Does the President propose immediate intervention? No—

Secure in the island the establishment of a stable government.

A Spanish government. "A stable government" is not the language that was used in the St. Louis platform in 1896. Criticising the Democratic Administration, the Republican party drafted in 1896 a platform at St. Louis declaring—

The Government of Spain having lost control of Cuba and being unable to protect the property or lives of resident American citizens or to comply with its treaty obligations, we believe that the Government of the United States should actively use its influence and good offices to restore peace and give independence to the island.

Why have you changed your mind in a day and a night? A midnight interview cuts off "immediate intervention." A midnight interview destroys the proposition of independence; and no suggestion of Cuban freedom is found in your President's message of yesterday, although two years have elapsed since you made that criticism on the Cleveland Administration.

"A stable government!" What do you propose now? "Let this Congress give to the President the Army and the Navy," he says, "and I will go over there and force the Cuban patriots, force the Cuban heroes, to submit to a stable government at the hands of Spain, because the Queen Regent has already advised the Administration that she has ordered a suspension of hostilities."

She can not order a suspension as against the insurgents. She has not among all her bull fighters and bullies manhood enough to order a suspension of hostilities on the insurgents' side. This Administration, with all its vacillating policy, which was criticised by the Chicago Tribune, an Administration paper, asks us to put the Army and the Navy in its hands to go over and punish the Cubans after three years of the most heroic fight for liberty that any people ever made on the face of the earth. I say it is an outrage—it is a stench in the nostrils of every decent American—to ask that the Army and the Navy be put into the hands of anybody to subordinate the men who have for three years fought for their liberty. We shall see whether the majority side of this House can be lined up and whipped into such a policy as that.

The resolutions of the Lincoln Post, at Newark, voice the sentiment of the American people. These resolutions were prepared by Dr. Grenville M. Weeks, the last surviving surgeon of the original Monitor, and passed, as I said before, by the largest Grand Army post in the State of New Jersey. Copies of the resolutions were sent to every member of this House, from which I read the following:

To the Congress and President of the United States:

Be it hereby resolved by Lincoln Post No. 11, Department of New Jersey, Grand Army of the Republic, that as the first step toward stopping further destruction of defenseless noncombatant patriots, women and children, by their present enforced death by starvation, Congress and the President of the United States be, and are herewith, further urged and encouraged, as they already have been by the unanimous voice of our State legislature, to give the patriot Cubans our nation's recognition of their independence at the earliest possible moment.

[Applause.]

There is a second resolution which I shall read. These resolutions embody all that statesmanship and diplomacy could suggest at this hour. They ought to have been indorsed and adopted by this House the next day after the Maine was destroyed:

Resolved, That we see therein no necessary occasion for war between this country and Spain, but only the giving of a long-deserved recognition of Cuba as an independent nation, with whom we would then have rights of trade that Spain thereafter has no more right to forbid than she has to forbid our trade with France or England.

And in a further resolution in substance saying:

If Spain does undertake to interfere with us, then comes the cause of war.

The Chicago Tribune, from which I proposed to read a moment ago, says:

The country has waited through two years of Cleveland and over one of McKinley to see an end put to Spanish misrule and Spanish atrocities in Cuba. During that long period the United States has helped Spain by endeavoring to deprive the insurgents of supplies, and has been abused by Spain for not doing more. The newspaper reports of the horrible sufferings of the Cuban pacificos, sneered at by Spanish sympathizers in and out of Congress, have been confirmed by Senators PROCTOR, GALLINGER, and THURSTON, all strong Administration Senators. A quarter of a million helpless, innocent Cubans have been slowly starved to death while this Government was spending millions to prevent Cubans in this country from sending arms and ammunition to the insurgents.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENTZ. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for five minutes longer.

Mr. JENKINS. We would have no objection on our side of the House if it be conceded that ten minutes additional be allowed to this side.

Mr. HANDY. We will be very glad to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the request for unanimous consent to allow five minutes additional time to the gentleman from Ohio and ten minutes to the other side. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Chairman, the same article says, continuing:

The policy of action speaks for itself. It requires no explanation. The policy of long-continued and incomprehensible delay requires explanation, especially when there are indications that it may be adhered to still longer.

I say that if the House had declared the independence of Cuba—had declared for Cuban independence—a year ago it would have been even late then, indeed, in doing its duty. I say that every hour we procrastinate, every hour that we postpone that recognition, we are adding to the murder not only of Cuban patriots, but ultimately to the murder of American patriots as well. [Applause.]

We heard a gentleman on the other side of the House say, during this discussion, that the rainy season is coming on in Cuba, and that we ought "to be slow in going to war at this time!" Mr. Chairman, I have never heard anybody say that we ought not to go to war because we are afraid of rain. [Laughter.] The time has come when we ought to take a decisive step, and the time has come, in view of conditions now existing, when we may stop talking of supporting the Administration. "The king can do no wrong" is an old saying. This old adage may serve the purpose of a cringing and cowardly people. It was invented in the early days of history and was a part of the traditions that have come down to us from the Dark Ages. It is reeking with brutality, and has no part in the traditions of a free country and among a free people.

This is a free country, and with the 447 Senators and Congressmen, representatives of a great people, we are better able to decide questions as to the policy of this Government in view of the facts before us, and are better fitted to advise the President, than are those who go at midnight, behind closed doors, to point out the views of the plutocrats and submit them as the voice of the people. This is a Government yet "by the people and for the people," and it will remain so. [Applause.]

And I predict this, that these 266 American brothers shall not forever rest unavenged in the soil of a tyrant. Our American manhood—the youth of this country—will not rest until that matter has been adjusted to their satisfaction, and to the honor of this country. They will be aroused by the language of poets and philosophers, and a popular sentiment will override the hesitating and faltering policy of the money power.

Lee Fairchild's words, published lately in the Washington Times, will put new life in the youth of this country. Young men will begin to feel and think in sympathy with the stricken hearts of the mothers, the widows, and the sisters of this land who have been bereft of loved ones by this horror in Havana Harbor, when they hear his noble words:

We have a thousand guns; what did we make them for,
If not in times like these to speak the speech of war?
Let's fight, or quit our brag, and take our banter back;
Paint white our ships again, and paint our White House black.

[Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, sometimes misstatement is so gross that it reaches the dignity of falsehood, and falsehood so gross that it becomes mendacity, and mendacity so foul that it becomes scoundrelism.

I say that the President of the United States has never said that he desires the use of the Army and the Navy at the hands of Congress in order to establish Spanish supremacy on the Island of Cuba. [Applause.] It is not true. There is no man who can, with an honest heart and with an honest purpose, read this message of the President and arrive at any conclusion of that character.

The President's whole argument leads up to the proposition that the conduct of Spain on that island during fifty years of misrule, fifty years of outrage, fifty years of tyranny, has brought about a condition that is now intolerable and insupportable and must cease. That is the language of the President of the United States. [Applause.] He asks the use of the Army and the Navy to put an end to that intolerable and insufferable condition. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is the argument of the President.

Mr. LENTZ. Does he not argue against according belligerent rights to the Cubans?

Mr. HEPBURN. I decline to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LENTZ. I should think you would.

Mr. HEPBURN. The President has made this argument. Every sentence in that message to this House teaches us that that is his purpose, and yet gentlemen say, in view of all the language that he has used and all of the argument that he has made and all of the recital of infamous and despotic conduct that he has called to our attention, that it is the purpose of the President to become the ally of the Spaniards. I say there is no word in that message that justifies any honorable man in making a declaration of that kind upon this floor. We are going there to fight Spain. We are going there, if we go, to establish a stable and a permanent government. What does that mean?

Here we have had fifty years of Spanish government, not stable, not permanent except in the villainy of its outrages. That character of outrage and villainy which has become insufferable, the President says, should be suffered no longer. It has created such an emergency as compels us to violate the otherwise friendly relations that we ought to have and go to the extreme of war in bringing an end to these insufferable conditions produced through the acts of Spain. And yet the gentleman dares to stand here and say that the message advocates the use of the Army and the Navy, the placing of the whole military power of the country in the hands of the President, in order that he may go to Cuba to perpetuate that which he reprobates, and to continue that which he says is now unendurable.

Mr. BALL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. I decline to yield. I can not yield a part of my ten minutes. The gentleman says that we are going there, or that the President desires to go there, for the purpose of maintaining the Spanish Government. Not so. The President says he wants that there should be upon that island the blessings of stable and permanent government. All of the traditions of our nation, all of the insistings of our statesmen have been upon the line that upon this continent there should be republican form of government alone. Is it necessary that in every message the President should reiterate that fact? That is the settled policy of this nation, to secure wherever it may aid that form of government—republican government. He wants a stable and permanent republican government. Does that mean Spanish rule? Has any man the right to make that argument?

Mr. LENTZ. Does he say republican government?

Mr. HEPBURN. No, he does not say that, but he supposed that you knew something about the history of this country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LENTZ. I do.

Mr. MAGUIRE. And we know something about the history of this Administration.

Mr. HEPBURN. He supposed that you knew something about the aspirations of American statesmen; that you knew something about the declaration that over and over and over again had been reiterated by every branch of this Government with reference to the character of government that should be formed on this hemisphere. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I shall not reply to the speech made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ]. I wish to say that I avail myself of the first opportunity that I have had to say that, misled by a series of publications, one of which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ] read in his speech of last Thursday, I located Mr. John J. McCook at a particular point of this transaction which he disclaims all connection with. At the proper time I will put into the RECORD a complete explanation of the whole of that matter.

I am going to refer now to only one thing that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ] has said on this particular occasion, and I do not do it for the purpose of elaborating a speech upon this occasion. The time is coming when gentlemen will have a full opportunity to assail the President of the United States, to send their bitterness and their opposition across the water to our enemies. The gentleman shall have a full opportunity to abuse his own constituents at home for any conservative expressions which they may have made through the telegraph or the mail, and he shall have that opportunity unaffected by any answer of mine. I wish here simply to say that the President of the United States has asked of Congress the power to use the Army and the Navy for the purpose of establishing in the Island of Cuba an independent government.

Mr. LENTZ. Why did he not say so?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will my friend from Ohio try for a minute to keep his mouth shut?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, that is impossible. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I state that the President of the United States has asked for the use of the Army and Navy to establish on the Island of Cuba an independent government, and has said so in the plainest kind of English language. [Cries of "Where?" on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will show you "where." Hold on.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended five minutes.

Mr. SIMPSON. Regular order!

Mr. JENKINS. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, let me finish my sentence.

Mr. BALL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio have five minutes.

Mr. JENKINS. They have objected.

The question was taken on the motion that the committee rise; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I move that the gentleman have five minutes.

Several MEMBERS. Division!

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I move that the gentleman have five minutes.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 119.

So the motion that the committee rise was rejected.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I move that the gentleman from Ohio be permitted to address the committee for five minutes—ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Ohio be permitted to continue his remarks for ten minutes.

Mr. HANDY. And ten minutes on this side to reply.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Five minutes. I only want five minutes.

Mr. HANDY. And five minutes on this side to reply.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I shall not object to that.

Mr. DALZELL. Yes, there is; I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington, that the gentleman from Ohio shall have five minutes?

Mr. DALZELL. I object to five minutes more on that side. If the gentleman from Ohio proceeds for five minutes now, we will have had twenty minutes on this side and there will have been thirty minutes consumed on the other side.

Mr. SIMPSON. Unless there is five minutes granted on this side, I shall have to object.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope that my ending shall not be cut off in such a way as to make me stultify myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington that the gentleman from Ohio be permitted to have five minutes?

Mr. SIMPSON. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. There is no objection, provided the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware be put to the House——

Mr. BARTLETT. Regular order!

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like——

Mr. BARTLETT. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BABCOCK. I desire to submit the following request: That the time be extended ten minutes, five minutes to be used by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and five minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Delaware.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that ten minutes' additional time for general debate be granted, five minutes to be given to the gentleman from Ohio and five minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. DALZELL. I object.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Do not do that; it will put me in a very awkward position; and I am surprised that the gentleman from Pennsylvania does any such unfriendly thing.

Mr. BARTLETT. Regular order, Mr. Chairman!

Mr. GROSVENOR. A parliamentary inquiry. What is the condition of the bill pending before the House?

Mr. DALZELL. The objection is withdrawn, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes, and the gentleman from Delaware will control five minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Chairman, after a great deal of tribulation, I am going to give to gentlemen on the other side a demonstration of every statement which I made. Now, if you will turn to page 3702 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, you will find this language used by the President, and I will leave it to the most acute analytical mind on the other side to say if that is not a proposition to establish on the Island of Cuba a government independent of Spain:

> In view of these facts and of these considerations, I ask the Congress to authorize and empower the President to take measures to secure a full and final termination of hostilities between the Government of Spain and the people of Cuba, and to secure in the island the establishment of a stable government, capable of maintaining order and observing its international obligations.

Mr. BRUCKER. Is it not a fact that Canada has a stable government under the British flag?

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is so much confusion I can not hear the gentleman's question.

What benefit do I get out of five minutes time if I am to be run over by everybody who thinks he knows something and thinks he is thinking about it? It is an outrage upon every man. Right at the moment a connected idea is attempted to be communicated somebody comes in and bellows in the ear of the speaker something that he can not understand and does not want to understand, either.

Now, I ask any gentleman on the other side to tell me how a government on an island or any country controlled by a foreign country as Cuba is now can have a government capable of discharging its "international obligations?" What are international obligations? Do colonies have international obligations? Did the President understand that there can be a colonial condition in Cuba by which there would be international obligations from that Government?

What representation have we from the Dominion Government? What representation do we send to the Dominion Government? What international power does the Dominion act confer under any kingly power on earth of an international nature? What international act does Canada do? What international act has any of the West India Islands ever done? What representative of this Government goes to Jamaica, Puerto Rico, or any island except those independent, as Haiti.

The very language of the President, as understood by every intelligent man and men of thought, is that the object and purpose of using force is to establish a government with international obligations and with the power to discharge those international obligations. So the whole appeal of the gentleman from Ohio is like the picture of a "painted ship upon a painted ocean." [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I do not care to reply to the gentleman from Ohio. He may not be satisfied with the situation as he left it last Thursday. I am. He may not be satisfied with all he has heard in regard to that matter. I am; and I am content to leave the matter exactly as I left it last Thursday night.

Mr. Chairman, the time is coming very rapidly—it will be here, I trust, to-morrow—when, under the guidance of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, this House will take action; and I will suggest to the gentlemen on the other side that there will be a degree of patriotism, a degree of unanimity of purpose, a degree of oneness in action that will surprise the gentleman when he looks over the vote that will be taken here to-morrow. [Great applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HANDY. I now yield so much of my time as remains to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, it is somewhat remarkable that a President of the United States should send to Congress a message upon one of the most important and one of the most exciting questions that has engaged the attention of the country for many years, and that he should conclude with a recommendation so ambiguous as to become the subject of controversy about its meaning.

The President of the United States in other portions of his message shows that he is a master of clear and excellent English, and yet when he reaches that portion of his message which, above all others, ought to have been distinct and unequivocal, he taxes the ingenuity of his friend from Ohio to make it clear to the House and to the country what he meant to say. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If the President desired authority to use the Army and Navy of the United States to establish an independent government in the Island of Cuba, why did he not ask for it in so many words? [Applause.] I am not willing to believe that he has deliberately veiled his meaning from this House and from the country. I believe—and in saying it I do him higher credit than his personal and political friends—that he meant exactly what he said, and said exactly what he meant. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Was it not as easy to say "an independent government" as it was to say "a stable government"? Only one word was required to describe either kind, and when the President used the word "stable" he must have meant it, and when he did not use the word "independent" we must assume that he did not mean it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] A stable government and an independent government may be vastly different. Nobody doubts that the Government of Canada is stable, but everybody knows that it is not independent. I do not doubt that Spain, with our help, can establish a stable government upon the Island of Cuba. I do not doubt that they can make peace there if we will help them; but they must first make it a solitude and then call it peace.

But, Mr. Chairman, in another portion of this message the President has not left us to doubt or conjecture his meaning. He says there are two kinds of intervention. One is an intervention in favor of one of the parties to the conflict, and the other is a neutral intervention, compelling both of them to keep the peace, and he proposes the latter. If Congress gives him the authority which he asks, to send an army and a navy to Cuba, then when his command reaches there and calls upon the people to be at peace, the Spanish general will reply: "We are at peace; our arms are stacked, and if anybody is disturbing the peace of this island, it is the insurgents under General Gomez."

The President's representative will then be compelled to say to the insurgent forces: "Stack your arms; go back to your homes and give up this heroic struggle which you have maintained for three long years against famine and fire and sword." If the insurgents refuse to obey, then the commander whom the President sends to Cuba must issue his order to fire upon those struggling patriots. Mark my words, a President who orders an American army to fire upon those Cuban soldiers will be odious, and his children after him will be odious, so long as the memory of his deed shall last. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. In view of the fact, is it conceivable——

[Loud cries of "Regular order!"]

Several MEMBERS. Let us hear the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. I say, in view of the infamy [cries of "Regular order!"] which would follow that act, is it conceivable that the President of the United States would desire to do it?

Mr. JENKINS. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to hear the observation of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

The motion of Mr. JENKINS was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the disagreement of the Senate to the House amendments to Senate bill No. 924, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

Joint resolution (S. R. 143) authorizing the use of a part of the appropriation heretofore made for the relief of the destitute citizens of the United States in the Island of Cuba for the aid of such citizens, refugees, and others who have reached our shores—to the Committee on Appropriations.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BABCOCK. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Will the gentleman withhold that motion a moment?

Mr. BABCOCK. Very well.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I desire to ask that Mr. Fairchild, who addressed the House yesterday, and was limited to ten minutes, be permitted to print his entire argument in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE] asks unanimous consent that Mr. Fairchild, contestant in the case of Fairchild vs. Ward, be allowed to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I object.

Mr. BABCOCK. I renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested, if compatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate all diplomatic correspondence between the Government of the United States and the Government of the Kingdom of Spain respecting affairs in Cuba; and is also requested to inform the Senate whether or not this Government has ever submitted to the Government of Spain the proposition of Cuban independence, and if so, in what form such proposition was made, and under what conditions.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 7748) to provide for a survey of Elk River, in Tennessee and Alabama; and

INTERVENTION IN CUBAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. DAVIS. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report a joint resolution and submit an accompanying report thereon. I ask that the joint resolution and report may be read.

The joint resolution (S. R. 149) for the recognition of the independence of the people of Cuba, demanding that the Government of Spain relinquish its authority and government in the Island of Cuba, and to withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters, and directing the President of the United States to use the land and naval forces of the United States to carry these resolutions into effect, was read the first time at length, as follows:

Whereas the abhorrent conditions which have existed for more than three years in the Island of Cuba, so near our own borders, have shocked the moral sense of the people of the United States, have been a disgrace to Christian civilization, culminating, as they have, in the destruction of a United States battle ship, with 266 of its officers and crew, while on a friendly visit in the harbor of Havana, and can not longer be endured, as has been set forth by the President of the United States in his message to Congress of April 11, 1898, upon which the action of Congress was invited: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, First. That the people of the Island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

Second. That it is the duty of the United States to demand, and the Government of the United States does hereby demand, that the Government of Spain at once relinquish its authority and government in the Island of Cuba and withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters.

Third. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed and empowered to use the entire land and naval forces of the United States, and to call into the actual service of the United States the militia of the several States, to such extent as may be necessary to carry these resolutions into effect.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to inquire whether the joint resolution is accompanied by a report?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report is in writing, and will now be read.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to inquire whether it has been printed, so that it may be read by members of the Senate?

Mr. COCKRELL. The chairman of the committee has asked that it be read.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask that the report be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the report this day submitted by Mr. DAVIS, as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the following Senate resolutions: Joint resolution No. 2, authorizing and requesting the President of the United States to issue a proclamation recognizing the political independence of the Republic of Cuba; Senate resolution No. 40, instructing the Committee on Foreign Relations to inquire what obligations the United States have assumed toward the people of Cuba by asserting and maintaining the right to prevent the acquisition of that island by any European power and compelling its people to remain subject to the dominion of Spain; Senate resolution No. 185, that it is the sense of the Senate that Congress should, with all due and convenient speed, acknowledge by appropriate act the political independence of the Republic of Cuba; joint resolution No. 132, recognizing the political independence of the Republic of Cuba, and for other purposes; joint resolution No. 133, recognizing the independence of the Republic of Cuba and declaring war against the Kingdom of Spain; joint resolution No. 134, recognizing the independence of the Republic of Cuba and providing for intervention by the United States; joint resolution No. 135, directing and empowering the President, in his discretion, to terminate, by intervention, the hostilities between Spain and the people of Cuba, and in favor of the independence of said people; joint resolution No. 142, for the recognition of the independence of the Republic of Cuba, and joint resolution No. 145, authorizing the President to take such steps as are necessary to put an end to hostilities in Cuba and to establish a republican form of government on that island; and the messages of the President of the United States dated March 28, 1898, and April 11, 1898, having duly considered the same, report as follows:

The destruction of the U. S. battle ship Maine and of 2 of her officers and 264 of her crew in the harbor of Havana on the night of February 15, 1898, excited, to an unprecedented degree, the compassion and resentment of the American people.

Manifestations of that resentment were suspended, although the feeling was not allayed, by the self-restraint of our people, who determined to hold their judgment in suspense concerning their ultimate action until an official investigation should disclose the cause of that great disaster and enable them by direct or circumstantial testimony to impute the responsibility therefor.

That investigation has been made. It was conducted with judicial thoroughness and deliberation. The difficulty of demonstrating by conclusive proof the efficient personal cause of that sinister event was the usual one of exposing plotted and mysterious crimes. No such difficulty, however, obscures its official and responsible cause.

The evidence and findings of the court of inquiry were transmitted to the Senate by the President, and, with the message, were duly referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That committee has considered them, and also the message of the President of April 11, 1898, with all the careful and anxious deliberation which great duties and responsibility impose upon the judgment and conscience.

The event itself, though in a certain sense a distinct occurrence, was linked with a series of precedent transactions which can not in reason be disconnected from it. It was the catastrophe of a unity of events extending over more than three years of momentous history. Standing by itself it would be, perhaps, merely an ominous calamity. Considered, as it must be, with the events with which reason and common sense must connect it, and with animus by Spain so plainly apparent that no one can even plausibly deny its existence, it is merely one reason for the conclusion to which the investigating mind must come in considering the entire subject of the relations of the United States with that Government. Your committee have also before them several Senate resolutions, which make it their duty to consider all our relations with Spain for the last three years, including the destruction of the Maine, as one of the incidents of the history of the war which, during that time, has devastated the Island of Cuba.

So clearly is the destruction of the Maine only a single incident in the relations of this Government with Spain that if that calamity had never happened the questions between the United States and that Government would press for immediate solution.

It is the opinion of your committee, having considered the testimony submitted to the board of inquiry, in connection with further testimony taken by the committee and with the relevant and established facts presented by the events of the last three years, that the destruction of the Maine was compassed either by the official act of the Spanish authorities or was made possible by a negligence on their part so willing and gross as to be equivalent in culpability to positive criminal action.

The status of the Maine while in the harbor of Havana and the duty of Spain toward her are defined in the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in Schooner Exchange vs. McFadden, 7 Cranch, 116, 141:

"If there be no prohibition, the ports of a friendly nation are considered as open to the public ships of all powers with whom it is at peace, and they are supposed to enter such ports and remain in them, while they are allowed to remain, under the protection of the Government of the place."

It is not contended that this duty of protection to which the public ship is thus entitled while allowed to remain in a port of a friendly nation imposes the obligation of an absolute guaranty of her safety. But it is insisted that the existence of the duty creates the obligation to use due diligence in its performance. When property and life are destroyed by an act which the exercise of due diligence by the person whose duty it is to use it could have prevented, the happening of such an event is sufficient proof that such diligence was not employed.

The system of civil and military police and espionage in Havana is all-pervading to an extent probably unequaled in any city in the world. It is not pretended that any employment was made as regards the safety of the Maine of this instrumentality for the detection or prevention of any attempt against her by private persons.

It is established that the Maine was destroyed by the explosion of a submarine mine, in position under her in a Spanish harbor, at a place where she had been moored to a buoy by the express direction and guidance of the Spanish authorities.

Explosive contrivances of this character are almost exclusively government agencies of warfare. There is no operation of a pacific character for which they can be employed, excepting the removal of wrecks or of harbor obstructions. They are not to be had in any place of private sale. Their destructive contents, excepting, perhaps, gunpowder, which undoubtedly was not employed in this instance, can not be easily obtained and are not easily made. The entire contrivance is a mechanism of a somewhat complicated character, not generally understood except by special manufacturers or by military or naval officers who have been instructed how to operate it.

Such mines, when sunk in harbors, are almost invariably discharged by an electric current, conducted over a wire leading from the engine of destruction to some place on the shore where a battery can be housed, guarded, and attended by trained operators. They are now placed, or are made ready to be placed, in all important harbors; it may fairly be presumed that they had been placed in the harbor of Havana, the history of the last three years being considered.

In complaisance to Spanish aversion no public vessel of the United States had visited that port during that period. The coming of the Maine had been announced to the Spanish authorities, and the military and naval portion of these did not receive her with the cordiality which such visits usually produce. Many of them expressed resentment at her presence. Certain newspapers in Madrid and Havana commented upon her visit in hostile terms.

There was, especially in Havana, among the officials who had been adherents of Weyler and who resented his recall, an expressed hatred of the United States. The time of the explosion must have been calculated for the moment when the Maine should swing within the destructive radius of the mine.

The report of the Spanish board of inquiry, sedulously promulgated in advance of that of the board of the United States, finding, after a hurried and most superficial investigation, that the catastrophe was from an internal and not from an external cause, was manifestly false, and was intended to induce public opinion to prejudge the question.

The duplicity, perfidy, and cruelty of the Spanish character, as they always have been, are demonstrated still to continue by their manifestations during the present war in Cuba. All these circumstances considered cumulatively, together with other considerations which will exactly accord with and add force to them, undenied and unexplained as they are by any authority excepting the baseless report of the Spanish board of inquiry, warrant the conclusion stated hereinbefore that the destruction of the Maine was compassed either by the official act of the Spanish authorities (and the ascertainment of the particular person is not material), or was made possible by a negligence on their part so willing and gross as to be equivalent in culpability to positive criminal action.

Upon due consideration of all of the relevant facts of the relations of this Government with Spain, including the destruction of the Maine, and of the history of the rebellion, it is the opinion of your committee that the United States ought at once to recognize the independence of the people of Cuba, and also ought to intervene to the end that the war and its unexampled atrocities shall cease, and that such independence shall become a settled political fact at the earliest possible moment, by the establishment by the free action of the people of Cuba when such action can be had, of a government independent in fact and form.

It is believed that recognition of the belligerency of the insurgents in Cuba, if it had been given seasonably, when it was suggested by concurrent resolutions to that effect passed by Congress, would have insured the speedy termination of the war without involving the United States in the contest. Such recognition was not given, and conditions have changed so materially since it was thus proposed that, if given now, it would fall far short of supplying the just requirements of the present situation in the light solely of the interests of the United States.

The recognition of the independence of the people of Cuba is justified and demanded by the highest considerations of duty, right, and policy.

The insurgents hold the eastern portion of the island, to the practical exclusion of Spain. This possession extends over one body of territory comprising fully one-half of the area of Cuba.

The extermination by Spain of the peaceful inhabitants of the western portion of the island has so affected the balance of population between these moieties of Cuba that the insurgents comprise in the eastern half nearly one-third of the population of the island. That third of the population pays taxes to them, serves in their armies, and in every way supports and is loyal to them. This situation has existed ever since the first few months of the war. The armies of Spain under Campos, Weyler, and Blanco, successively, have been repelled in every invasion that they have attempted on the eastern half of the island.

The cause of Spain has continually grown weaker and that of the insurgents has grown stronger. The former is making no substantial effort for the recovery of these lost provinces. Their people are secure from invasion and cruel administration. Spain has never been able to subject them to her unprecedented and murderous policy of concentration and extermination. Her armies have been more than decimated in the attempt to subdue them. Two hundred thousand of her soldiers have failed to reduce the insurgents. The few reenforcements that she is now sending to Cuba do not supply a tithe of her losses caused by battle and disease.

Her control over the western portion of the island is dominance over a desolation which she herself has created. Even there she controls only the territory occupied by her cantonments and camps. Outside these the insurgents are everywhere in presence.

In the population of Cuba the native born preponderate in a very large proportion, probably of 8 to 1. We have been assured by the most unimpeachable authority (we mean Senators PROCTOR, GALLINGER, THURSTON, and MONEY) that the native-born Cubans everywhere, even within the military lines of Spain, are opposed to the parent State and are in sympathy with the insurgents.

We have also been assured by the same authority that the native Cubans, by superiority in education, are better qualified than the Spaniards, and are thoroughly capable to administer the government of the island.

The preceding observations have assumed a certain control and sovereignty by Spain over the western portion of Cuba. We have indicated its character. It is limited to scattered and fortified areas, and it is not a civil sovereignty. It is merely a military occupation of fortified places. Even this dominion has been made possible and continues only by the infliction of a policy for which the history of no people (excepting possibly that of Spain herself) furnishes any example.

The world knows what that policy is, and all civilization execrates it. It consists in compelling, under penalty of death, the rural population of the western part of the island to leave their homes, their fields, their stock, and other chattels, and mass themselves between the outskirts of certain designated towns and a military cordon intercepting their return into the country. As they departed from their homes, their houses were burned; the growth of their fields was trodden down by cavalry; their agricultural implements, furniture, and domestic utensils were destroyed; their cattle and horses were swept away by Spain. Throughout wide areas of a region of unsurpassed fertility, which had been densely populated for more than two centuries, not one living thing, brute or human, not one habitation, not one productive field is to be seen.

For the miserable condition to which an entire population is reduced Spain has afforded no substantial relief, and the evil and distress have become so huge and her financial debility is so extreme that she is now unable to relieve, even if she could be supposed to have the disposition to do so.

The result has been that over 200,000 of the subjects of Spain have been killed by the action of that Government, and 200,000 more are suffering from famine and disease.

There has been no distinction of sex or age in this protracted and torturing massacre. The children of this generation have been starved to death, and the immolation of womanhood has destroyed the possibility of posterity.

There can be no doubt that the contriver of this unexampled scheme of atrocity intended to depopulate, to the full extent of an ability undeniably great in the conception and perpetration of colossal crime, the island of its native people and to repeople it by natives of Spain.

We can not consent upon any conditions that the depopulated portions of Cuba shall be recolonized by Spain any more than she should be allowed to found a new colony in any other part of this hemisphere or island thereof. Either act is regarded by the United States as dangerous to our peace and safety.

That Government has violated the laws of civilized warfare in the conduct of her military operations. Her troops have slaughtered prisoners after their surrender and have massacred the sick and wounded insurgent soldiers and their physicians and nurses in their captured hospitals.

When publicists and jurists speak of the right of sovereignty of a parent state over a people or a colony they mean that divinely delegated supremacy in the exercise of which man should show "likest God." They never mean that a usurpation of diabolism shall be sanctified upon the plea that it is sovereignty none the less than that of a well-ordered and humane government. Against such reasoning the—

"Moral laws
"Of nature and of nations speak aloud;"

and declare that the State which thus perverts and abuses its power thereby forfeits its sovereignty. And this principle has been the foundation of the repeated interventions by the States of Europe in the affairs of Turkey, who, abominable and atrocious as her cruelty has been toward her subjects in Greece and in the northern part of her dominions in Europe, and in Armenia, has not approached the eminence at which Spain stands in solitary and unapproachable infamy.

The recognition of the independence of the people of Cuba would not be a justifiable cause of war by Spain against the United States. Upon this principle the best-esteemed authorities are agreed. Among their opinions the following declaration of Mr. Webster in his letter to Mr. Hülsemann stands preeminent:

"If, therefore, the United States had gone so far as formally to acknowledge the independence of Hungary, although, as the result has proved, it would have been a precipitate step, and one from which no benefit would have resulted to either party, it would not nevertheless have been an act against the law of nations, provided they took no part in her contest with Austria."

If not an act against the law of nations, it, of course, could not be a justifiable ground for war.

The recognition of the independence of the people of Cuba entitles the United States to insist that the war shall be conducted in accordance with those humane laws which have been ordained by the common consent of the civilized world, and which have done so much to mitigate the horrors of warfare. So long as this Government abstains from such recognition Spain is entitled to insist that we agree with her that the insurrection is merely a treasonable riot and not a formal and organized rebellion, and that she is therefore entitled to execute upon the insurgents and upon American citizens, and all persons upon the island, the penalties of a domestic code which is an affront to civilization.

The United States has been in this attitude of concurrence ever since the beginning of the war. It has, as a consequence, in a spirit of forbearance, submitted to many atrocities perpetrated by Spain upon our own citizens which, under recognition, would have had no warrant in international law and would have afforded just grounds of procedure by this Government under its acknowledged principles. Citizens of the United States have been condemned to death by military tribunals in violation of their treaty rights. The expostulations of this Government have been in effect merely petitions for royal clemency.

The Competitor prisoners, captured under our flag, were imprisoned nearly seventeen months and were never brought to trial, though they were subjected to many harsh, illegal, and degrading preliminary examinations. The entire proceeding against them was unlawful and in derogation of their rights and of our honor. But as they were technically, in the attitude which the United States had assumed and had placed them in refusing recognition of belligerency or independence, merely ordinary criminals prosecuted by Spain under her domestic penal code, this Government, it was logically insisted by Spain, had no right to make the question one of international obligation. It accepted royal clemency and, in the person of its citizens, received a pardon for a crime instead of demanding reparation for a violated right.

The United States has been compelled by its attitude of nonrecognition to assist Spain by its execution of our neutrality statutes. If there is no war, and the insurgents are merely an unlawful confederacy of common insurrectionists, they can have no legitimate commercial dealings with the citizens of the United States.

Nor can the insurgents object to Spain having such dealings of every character, including the purchase of supplies, which, had recognition been accorded, would be contraband of war, and therefore not to be furnished except through breach of neutrality. The United States has therefore been an assistant of Spain. The supplies for that power have been largely purchased in this country. The unrecognized insurgents have had no right to complain.

On the other hand, they and their adherents have been prohibited from making such purchases and from exporting any supplies, however acquired. There has, therefore, been no real neutrality by this Government throughout the entire business. To the contrary, Spain has been the customer of the people of the United States, who have sold her, with technical lawfulness, everything that she has required to repress by such processes as we have indicated a people struggling against tyranny for their liberties. To prevent the insurgents from buying or exporting at all while Spain has bought and exported to the extent of her requirements, the Navy and revenue vessels of the United States have been diligently and successfully employed. It has been stated, and we believe with entire correctness, that this vigilance and policing of the seas by the United States in favor of Spain and against the insurgents has cost this Government more than $2,000,000.

The conflict of opinion and definition among the jurists upon the subject of intervention is very great. Some of them deny its existence as a right under any circumstances, excepting of self-defense against an imminent peril, while other writers of equal authority maintain the validity of its assertion as a right for causes which may be inconsistent with that great foundation principle of international law, the equal and inviolable sovereignty of States.

The extremes of these opinions are represented by Guizot and Arntz. The former declares that "no State has the right to intervene in the situation or internal government of another State, except only when the interest of its own safety renders such intervention indispensable."

Arntz maintains that the right of intervention exists:

1. "When the institutions of one state violate or threaten to violate the rights of another state, or when such violation is the necessary consequence of its institutions and the impossibility of an orderly coexistence of states results therefrom."

2. "When a government, acting entirely within the limits of its prerogatives of sovereignty, violates the rights of humanity, whether by measures contrary to the interests of other states or by excess of injustice and cruelty which deeply wounds public morals and civilization.

"The right of intervention is a legitimate one, because, however important may be the rights of sovereignty and independence, there is one thing of still greater importance, and that is the law of humanity and human society, which ought not to be outraged."

Between these extremities of opinion the differences among the publicists are exceedingly various and irreconcilable. Professor Hall, in his work on International Law (3d edition, page 288, note 1), in considering the opinions of modern international jurists who touch upon humanitarian intervention, says that "the treatment which the subject receives from them is merely fragmentary, notice being taken of some only of its grounds, which are usually approved or disapproved without very clear reference to a general principle."

Vattel (liv. 1, chapter iv, section 56) considers it permissible to succor a people oppressed by its sovereign, but does not appear to sanction any of the analogous grounds of intervention. Wheaton (Elem., part II, chapter 1, section 20), Bluntschli (section 478), Mamiani (page 86), give the right of aiding an oppressed race.

Heffter (section 46), while denying the right of intervention to repress tyranny, holds that so soon as a civil war has broken out a foreign state may assist either party engaged in it. Calvo (section 166) and Fiore (1, 446) think that states can intervene to put an end to slaughter.

Vattel says, Book II, Chapter IV, top page 157, "As to those monsters who, under the title of sovereigns, render themselves the scourges and horror of the human race, they are savage beasts, whom every brave man may justly exterminate from the face of the earth.

"All antiquity has praised Hercules for delivering the world from Antæus, a Busiris, and a Diomede."

If these opinions state the correct rule, as we believe they do, the right of intervention by the United States in the present instance is indubitable. They are, however, controverted by other publicists of great eminence. It is possibly correct to say as to this conflict of opinion that this portion of international law is, though operative in certain cases, in that formative and progressive condition of development by which many benign principles, though formerly contested, have at last become firmly established.

The following reflections of Mr. Pomeroy upon this subject (Int. Law, page 242 et seq.) appear to be well considered:

"How far the right of intervention legitimately extends, under what circumstances it may be invoked, to what extent it may be carried, are questions which have given rise to much discussion—questions that have never been authoritatively settled, and perhaps never will be settled.

"Hardly a writer absolutely denies the existence of the right at all; it would seem to be unsafe to go to this length. On the other hand, it seems almost equally unsafe to admit the right to exist at all, for, as it is utterly impossible to place any exact limits upon it, its very admission may open the door to vast and terrible abuses.

* * * * * * *

"While the fact is as stated that instances of intervention are and have been constantly occurring, I am of opinion that the whole subject does not so much belong to international law as to politics.

* * * * * * *

"In short, I can not think that the subject of intervention has been, or perhaps can be, regulated by the positive international law. It must be relegated to the domain of those high politics, those principles of expediency, which control the conduct, both domestic and foreign, of nations."

The actual conduct and policies of nations give warrant to these observations. To sustain repeated intervention during the present century no law has been invoked. They have been acts of necessity or policy. This statement is corroborated by the creation and existence of two policies, one of Europe, the other of the United States, each of which is based distinctly upon the assertion of an intention to intervene under certain circumstances. We refer to the principle of the balance of power and to the Monroe doctrine. Each is a distinct and arbitrary policy of intervention, to be effected in certain contingencies in furtherance of national policies, and to justify which no canon of international law was ever invoked. The former has profoundly affected the relations of the European States and the independence of many of those sovereignties.

The latter has kept the powers of Europe out of the American continents ever since it was promulgated. It was a distinct announcement that the United States would intervene, under certain expressed circumstances, in the affairs of every Central American and South American State. The United States did intervene by threat and show of force in the affairs of Mexico and France, and compelled the evacuation of that Republic by a European power, whose own prior intervention in Mexican affairs had overthrown a republic and established a monarchy upon its ruins. No publicist has ever asserted that either of these policies is part of the law of nations.

Justification for intervention is strengthened in such cases as the present, where the oppressions by a state of its subjects have been so inveterate, atrocious, and sanguinary as to require intervention by other nations in the interests of humanity and the peace of the world, for the purpose of overthrowing that government and establishing or recognizing another in its place as the only means of extirpating an otherwise incurable and dangerous evil.

The conduct of the European powers respecting Turkey has been pursuant to the policy which impels one nation to intervene in the affairs of another state to stop cruelty and massacre, and, if necessary, to depose it from sovereignty. That State became a member of the commonwealth of European powers by the treaty of Paris of 1856. The integrity and sovereignty of the Ottoman Empire were guaranteed. It has stood ever since upon an equality with Spain in all respects. And yet Turkey has been the subject of repeated interventions since 1856, which have restrained her sovereignty, usurped her domestic administration, repressed her cruelties, and partially dismembered her empire.

The people of her several Danubian provinces, oppressed by her misgovernment, rose in rebellion. A scene of massacre followed, which stood without precedent until it was made to seem merciful by the atrocities perpetrated by Spain upon her subjects in Cuba. Europe protested at the conference of Constantinople and suggested reforms and concessions in favor of the oppressed people, which Turkey promised to grant in part, but vitiated that promise by evasions and subterfuges as to some most material requirements. Upon this Europe ceased to represent, remonstrate, and implore. Russia intervened by force. Her military successes produced the treaty of San Stefano between that power and Turkey, which established the political status of the revolted provinces. But, in the opinion of the other European powers, Russia herself had obtained too much under that treaty.

The consequence was the interposition of the great powers of Europe in the affairs of Russia and Turkey. It was substantially an intervention, though otherwise denominated, which compelled Russia and Turkey to take part in the Congress of Berlin, held in 1878. They did so because they were constrained by the certainty of intervention by force in case they should refuse. The result of that congress was the partial dismemberment of European Turkey and the establishment of new states therein, some partially autonomous, others entirely independent. The cause of these great interventions was the cruelty of Turkey toward her own subjects. The result was that the interventions secured their independence.

The cases of the Danubian provinces are so similar to that of Cuba as to be nearly identical. The fact that the wrongs were inflicted by Mohammedans upon Christians does not mitigate the responsibility of Spain or make intervention as to her any less rightful. Surely Christian Spain, from the fact that she is a Christian state, is not given greater warrant to exterminate her subjects than Mohammedan Turkey possessed to extirpate hers.

Great Britain intervened as to Egypt upon financial grounds, and is now administering the revenues and finances of that province.

The recent interventions of the European powers in favor of Turkey and against Greece in her endeavor to assist the Cretan insurgents is familiar history. So also is the intervention of the same powers which checked the advance of the armies of Turkey into Greece.

The attitude of the United States toward the present question has been based upon the right of intervention and the intention to exercise it in certain contingencies. President Cleveland, in his message of December 7, 1896, declared that—

"Whatever circumstances may arise, our policy and our interests would constrain us to object to the acquisition of the island or an interference with its control by any other power.

"It should be added that it can not be reasonably assumed that the hitherto expectant attitude of the United States will be indefinitely maintained. While we are anxious to accord all due respect to the sovereignty of Spain, we can not view the pending conflict in all its features and properly apprehend our inevitably close relations to it and its possible results without considering that by the course of events we may be drawn into such an unusual and unprecedented condition as will fix a limit to our patient waiting for Spain to end the contest, either alone and in her own way or with our friendly cooperation.

"When the inability of Spain to deal successfully with the insurrection has become manifest, and it is demonstrated that her sovereignty is extinct in Cuba for all purposes of its rightful existence, and when a hopeless struggle for its reestablishment has degenerated into a strife which means nothing more than the useless sacrifice of human life and the utter destruction of the very subject-matter of the conflict, a situation will be presented in which our obligations to the sovereignty of Spain will be superseded by higher obligations, which we can hardly hesitate to recognize and discharge.

"Deferring the choice of ways and methods until the time for action arrives, we should make them depend upon the precise conditions then existing; and they should not be determined upon without giving careful heed to every consideration involving our honor and interest, or the international duty we owe to Spain. Until we face the contingencies suggested, or the situation is by other incidents imperatively changed, we should continue in the line of conduct heretofore pursued, thus in all circumstances exhibiting our obedience to the requirements of public law and our regard for the duty enjoined upon us by the position we occupy in the family of nations.

"A contemplation of emergencies that may arise should plainly lead us to avoid their creation, either through a careless disregard of present duty or even an undue stimulation and ill-timed expression of feeling. But I have deemed it not amiss to remind the Congress that a time may arrive when a correct policy and care for our interests, as well as a regard for the interests of other nations and their citizens, joined by considerations of humanity and a desire to see a rich and fertile country, intimately related to us, saved from complete devastation, will constrain our Government to such action as will subserve the interests thus involved and at the same time promise to Cuba and its inhabitants an opportunity to enjoy the blessings of peace."

President McKinley, in his message of December 6, 1897, said:

"The instructions given to our new minister to Spain before his departure for his post directed him to impress upon that Government the sincere wish of the United States to lend its aid toward the ending of the war in Cuba by reaching a peaceful and lasting result, just and honorable alike to Spain and to the Cuban people. These instructions recited the character and duration of the contest, the widespread losses it entails, the burdens and restraints it imposes upon us, with constant disturbance of national interests, and the injury resulting from an indefinite continuance of this state of things.

"It was stated that at this juncture our Government was constrained to seriously inquire if the time was not ripe when Spain of her own volition, moved by her own interests and every sentiment of humanity, should put a stop to this destructive war and make proposals of settlement honorable to herself and just to her Cuban colony. It was urged that as a neighboring nation, with large interests in Cuba, we could be required to wait only a reasonable time for the mother country to establish its authority and restore peace and order within the borders of the island; that we could not contemplate an indefinite period for the accomplishment of this result.

"No solution was proposed to which the slightest idea of humiliation to Spain could attach, and indeed precise proposals were withheld to avoid embarrassment to that Government. All that was asked or expected was that some safe way might be speedily provided and permanent peace restored.

"Sure of the right, keeping free from all offense ourselves, actuated only by upright and patriotic considerations, moved neither by passion nor selfishness, the Government will continue its watchful care over the rights and property of American citizens and will abate none of its efforts to bring about by peaceful agencies a peace which shall be honorable and enduring. If it shall hereafter appear to be a duty imposed by our obligations to ourselves, to civilization, and humanity to intervene with force, it shall be without fault on our part and only because the necessity for such action will be so clear as to command the support and approval of the civilized world."

These declarations more than implied that this Government would interpose in the event of failure within a reasonable time to conquer the insurgents or to induce them by concessions of home rule to lay down their arms. They have not been subdued. The autonomy proffered was specious and illusory. It has been rejected by the insurgents not because it was specious and illusory, but because they will accept nothing short of complete national independence. The suggestion of a more complete autonomy has also been rejected by them. They declare to the United States and Spain alike that no terms short of independence, which those powers may attempt to prescribe to them will be accepted. Spain refuses to grant independence.

The war, then, must go on, and the misery which has shocked the civilized world must continue and increase unless it is terminated by the triumph of Cuba or Spain or by the interposition of the United States.

It is the opinion of this committee that the time to interpose has arrived; that intervention which will stop the war and secure the national independence of Cuba should at once take place. If under all the circumstances Spain shall choose to regard such action by this Government as a cause of war, that consequence, however deplorable, will be accepted by the American people with all the fortitude that confidence in the justice of their action can inspire.

Such intervention is justifiable and necessary for the following reasons: The present situation in Cuba has become a menace to the peace of the world, and especially to the peace and safety of the United States. Spain has bid for European intervention, thus far apparently without success, but the conditions which make such intervention possible should be removed at once.

For nearly three years the hostilities in Cuba and the Spanish administration of that island have involved this Government in perilous relations with Spain and raised questions of right and responsibility of which no prospect of settlement is apparent. So long as these conditions are allowed to remain unsettled they will increase an irritation which has already become intolerable, and which will inevitably ultimately require adjustment by measures much more vigorous than now seem adequate to compose existing difficulties.

Spain has failed to perform her treaty obligations and other international duties toward the United States. To give a minute specification of these derelictions would unnecessarily extend this paper. They are the familiar matters of current history. American citizens have been seized and imprisoned without shadow of right, and have been proceeded against by violent and irregular forms, in violation of treaty obligations.

The assassination of Ruiz, an American citizen, was the act of the Spanish officials, who held him in a custody unwarranted by his treaty rights. No reparation has been made for this act, although it has been demanded by this Government.

A justifiable cause for intervention has been afforded by the barbarity with which Spain has conducted her military operations; by her slaughter of captured insurgent soldiers, and by her extermination of not less than 200,000 of her own noncombatant subjects—men, women, and children—by driving them from their homes into places of concentration and there suffering them to die of starvation and disease.

In 1896 there were $50,000,000 of property in the Island of Cuba belonging to the citizens of the United States. Much of this has been destroyed, and much of that destruction has been by the acts of Spain. The destruction of the remainder she has been unable or unwilling to prevent.

The claims on file in the Department of State against Spain for indemnity for this destroyed property are about $16,000,000 in amount.

Her military officers have levied contributions upon American planters as the price for the preservation of their estates and the continuance of their agricultural operations.

In 1893 the commerce of the United States with Cuba had reached the annual sum of nearly $100,000,000. Since that time it has been substantially annihilated by the methods of Spanish military and civil maladministration. Certain sworn statements made before the committee and other documents are herewith submitted as part of this report.

The committee recommend the adoption of the accompanying resolution:

Whereas the abhorrent conditions which have existed for more than three years in the Island of Cuba, so near our own borders, have shocked the moral sense of the people of the United States, have been a disgrace to Christian civilization, culminating, as they have, in the destruction of a United States battle ship, with 266 of its officers and crew, while on a friendly visit in the harbor of Havana, and can not longer be endured, as has been set forth by the President of the United States in his message to Congress of April 11, 1898, upon which the action of Congress was invited: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, First. That the people of the Island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

Second. That it is the duty of the United States to demand, and the Government of the United States does hereby demand, that the Government of Spain at once relinquish its authority and government in the Island of Cuba and withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters.

Third. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed and empowered to use the entire land and naval forces of the United States, and to call into the actual service of the United States the militia of the several States, to such extent as may be necessary to carry these resolutions into effect.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. TURPIE. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. FORAKER. I yield.

Mr. TURPIE. I am much obliged for the courtesy of the honorable Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from Indiana permit the resolutions reported by the committee to be again read?

Mr. TURPIE. Allow me to say, Mr. President, that I am much obliged for the courtesy of the honorable Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I ask what is the pending question before the Senate? If there be a pending question or resolution, I should like to have it reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield, so that the joint resolution reported by the committee may be again read to the Senate?

Mr. TURPIE. The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] has the floor, and I am only speaking by his courtesy.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Secretary will read the joint resolution before the Senate accompanying the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. COCKRELL. The second reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his point of order.

Mr. HOAR. I demand that the resolution lie over one day for consideration under the rules.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that there is a minority report of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I hope the Senator will allow it to be made, so as to get it before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I do not object to that, but I wish to raise my point.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will consider the point of order after the report of the minority of the committee shall have been made.

Mr. TURPIE. I submit the report of the minority of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and in behalf of the minority of the committee I also offer an amendment to the first section of the original resolution and ask that the report and the amendment—they are both brief—may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report and the amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

VIEWS OF MINORITY.

The undersigned members of said committee cordially concur in the report made upon the Cuban resolutions, but we favor the immediate recognition of the Republic of Cuba, as organized in that island, as a free, independent, and sovereign power among the nations of the world.

DAVID TURPIE.
R. Q. MILLS.
JNO. W. DANIEL.
J. B. FORAKER.

The amendment reported by the minority of the committee was to amend the first paragraph by inserting, in line 4, after the word "independent," the following:

And that the Government of the United States hereby recognizes the Republic of Cuba as the true and lawful government of that island.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask that the minority report, together with the proposed amendment, be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. They will all be printed, as a matter of course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the order to print will be made as to all the papers submitted by the committee.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution go over one day under the rule.

Mr. FORAKER. I have the floor, Mr. President, I believe.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a point of order, which is that the resolution lie over one day for consideration.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator made that point on the other resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Let us have a decision on the point of order. The Senator can make his speech afterwards, of course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the point of order——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I have the floor, I believe.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me?

Mr. FORAKER. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WHITE. I merely desire to inquire whether the committee's request with reference to the printing includes the evidence taken by the committee upon the late hearings and also the report of the Spanish board which is referred to in the report of the committee?

Mr. DAVIS. It does all that.

Mr. HOAR. I should like, Mr. President, to have the point of order which I have made ruled upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is ready to rule upon it.

Mr. HOAR. I think we ought to have the resolution before the Senate in print and the report in print before we act upon them. It is a very grave and serious matter.

Mr. DAVIS. If I may be allowed to make a statement, Mr. President, I do not think the point of order practically material. Let me suggest that the resolutions as reported from the committee are in effect a substitute for a large number of other resolutions recited in the caption of the report, so that the necessary reading of them has taken place, and these resolutions are by way of substitute.

Mr. HOAR. For which of them?

Mr. FORAKER. There have been two readings of both resolutions.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, if I may be allowed to make a suggestion——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the Senator from Massachusetts upon his point of order.

Mr. HOAR. This resolution was reported by the committee as a new resolution, and not as an amendment to any heretofore introduced. If it has been so reported, then it must attach itself to one particular subject, one particular resolution, which has had its regular reading. I wish to ask the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations if he proposes to ask the Senate to consider this matter without having the report in print and without having this resolution in print? Does the Senator propose to make it a five-minute question?

Mr. DAVIS. In answer to the Senator from Massachusetts, I will say that I do not; but I know perfectly well that the speaking which will take place on these resolutions this afternoon makes the point of order utterly immaterial.

Mr. HOAR. That may be or may not be.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not understand the statement of the Senator from Minnesota. Will the Senator repeat it?

Mr. DAVIS. My statement was that there is no disposition unduly to press this measure, but there is the utmost desire to press it with all the diligence that the necessity of the case requires. I stated that the point of order made by my friend the Senator from Massachusetts was, in my opinion, immaterial, because it is a well-known fact that speaking upon this matter this afternoon will practically throw the case over until to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to have this grave and serious matter, one of the two or three most serious matters in the history of this Republic, proceed duly and in order. I know very well that after these resolutions have taken their orderly position, if any Senator desires to address the Senate on that subject, or any other, the privilege would be accorded to him, and it would not be necessary even to speak of it as a privilege to be accorded. There are methods enough of accomplishing that under the rules of the Senate. So, if the Senator from Ohio or any other Senator prefers to address the Senate on this grave question to-day, before Senators are possessed, except by one imperfect hearing, of the substance of that report and the resolutions, that is a matter solely for that Senator's discretion and solely within his power. That I do not interfere with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken under Rule XIV and Rule XXVI.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Then the matter goes over and will be printed, of course.

Mr. GRAY. It will be printed.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, notwithstanding the fact that the resolutions go over, I prefer to speak now. We shall save some time by doing so, for at some time before these resolutions are acted upon I shall address, or I shall desire at least to address the Senate in support of them.

Mr. President, in his message of the 11th instant the President of the United States has very thoroughly and with striking effect and force reviewed the entire Cuban question. After a thorough discussion of it in all its features and aspects, he announces certain conclusions which he has reached. Among these conclusions is the following. I read from the President's message. Speaking of the long-protracted struggle in Cuba, he says:

> The long trial has proved that the object for which Spain has waged the war can not be attained.

After stating his conclusions, the President then makes certain recommendations, some in a negative and some in an affirmative form. One of the negative recommendations is that notwithstanding he finds and states to us that the effort of Spain to subdue and conquer the insurgents in Cuba has been futile, we shall continue to deny to the people of Cuba and also to the government established by the insurgents of Cuba a recognition of independence.

The President then proceeds to make certain affirmative recommendations. One of these affirmative recommendations is that Congress shall invest him with power—

> To take measures to secure a full and final termination of hostilities between the Government of Spain and the people of Cuba, and to secure in the Island the establishment of a stable government, capable of maintaining order and observing its international obligations.

The President makes other recommendations, but I do not care to refer to them in this connection.

This message, with these recommendations, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I need not say, after the reading of the very elaborate report of the Foreign Relations Committee, that it has given to this subject the most profound, careful, and exhaustive consideration. That report was prepared by our distinguished chairman [Mr. DAVIS]. I may, therefore, with propriety speak of it in words of compliment. It must be manifest to every Senator that it bears the marks of that ability which characterizes all the productions of that distinguished Senator's pen.

Together with this report, the committee has placed before us, with its favorable recommendation for adoption, a set of resolutions. Those resolutions have just been read. They declare, in the first place, that the people of the Island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent. In their second proposition they declare that it is the duty of this Government to demand, and that this Government does hereby—demand by the passage of these resolutions—not by the action of somebody else hereafter to be taken—does hereby demand that Spain shall at once withdraw her land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters.

The resolutions then go on to empower the President to employ the Army and the Navy of the United States to carry them into effect.

It will be observed, if you compare the recommendations of the President with the recommendations of the committee, that there are some differences of opinion as to what should be done, although we are in accord as to the main great purpose that is to be accomplished; for it will be observed, Mr. President, that the committee have differed from the President upon the question of recognizing the independence of the people of Cuba, and as the Senate has been advised by the minority, or rather by the supplemental report just made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], a minority of that committee, consisting of five members out of eleven, have reported that in their judgment there should be added to the resolutions reported by the committee another resolution recognizing the Republic or Cuba as the true and lawful government of that island.

Mr. FRYE. Were there not 4 out of 11?

Mr. GRAY. Yes; 4 out of 11.

Mr. FORAKER. I thought there were 5. I beg your pardon. The report will show.

Mr. FRYE. There were only 4.

Mr. FORAKER. Four, is it? I thought there were 5.

Mr. CULLOM. No; the minority report is signed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER].

Mr. FORAKER. No matter how many signed it, the minority report is there. I signed it, and I stand here to speak in behalf of that resolution so recommended by the minority of that committee, as well as to speak in favor of all the resolutions recommended by the committee unanimously.

The committee, Mr. President, in addition to this provision for recognizing the independence of the people of Cuba, have further declared that the time has come not for further negotiations, but for Spain to withdraw her land and naval forces. In other words, they have differed with the President as to the form and character of that intervention.

I shall speak presently with more particularity as to the question of our right at this time to recognize the independence of the people of Cuba and to recognize the independence of that government. I want first to speak briefly of the question of intervention——

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the resolution provides that the Government of Spain shall at once relinquish its authority and government in the Island of Cuba and also withdraw its land and naval forces.

Mr. FORAKER. I thank the Senator from Alabama for calling my attention to the text of the resolution. I was not looking at the resolution, although I had it in my hand, and was not endeavoring to quote from it, but only to state the substance of it.

As I was remarking, Mr. President, I desire first to speak of the difference between the Executive and the committee, as shown by these recommendations, as to the form and character of intervention. The committee differed with the President in the first place because, in the judgment of the committee, the time had come when no further negotiations were in order. In the language of the President employed in this message, the time for action, in the judgment of the committee, had come, and the committee felt that while they had the matter under consideration they would provide for action, immediate and specific, and, as they believed, in character and keeping with the desires of the American people in respect to this matter.

In the second place, Mr. President, the committee, or at least some members of the committee, had grave doubts as to the right of Congress to confer upon the Chief Executive of the nation the conditional exercise of the war-making power. Congress alone is invested with the war-making power. The proposition of the President was that he should take effective steps, such of course as he might deem effective, and that if he should fail to secure a cessation of hostilities in Cuba, then and in that event he was authorized to employ the Army and the Navy of the United States. In other words, make war in the condition or contingency that his negotiations should fail. I for one at least think the committee generally doubted the legality of that proposition.

Then, Mr. President, as to the establishment of a stable government by the President of the United States in the Island of Cuba, the committee were of the opinion that there might possibly be grave doubt as to the right of Congress to empower the President of the United States or for the Congress itself to create and establish a stable government in the Island of Cuba for the benefit of the Cuban people.

However that may be, after the committee had declared that the people of the Island of Cuba are and of right ought to be free and independent, the proposition that the President of the United States or the Congress of the United States or any other exterior power should establish for that independent people a government stable or otherwise was inconsistent.

If a people be free and independent, as we have in this first proposition declared that the people of the Island of Cuba are, they, and they alone, have power to establish their government. Independence and sovereignty go hand in hand, and any people who have independence have the capacity and the right to exercise sovereignty, and it is a denial of independence to say in the next breath after you have declared it that we will undertake, or we do hereby reserve the right and power, to establish for that independent people a government such as in our judgment and opinion may be stable.

I mention these points of difference only because it is absolutely essential to an intelligent discussion that we should know what are the issues which have been joined. Without knowing what are the questions of difference we are groping in the dark.

As I said a moment ago, I do not propose, beyond the mere statement of these grounds of differences with the Executive as to intervention, to discuss that proposition. I return therefore at once to a discussion of the question whether or not the committee is justified in recommending the recognition at this time of the independence of the people of Cuba.

Whether or not a people who have revolted and rebelled against a sovereign power and are striving for independence are entitled to be recognized as an independent state is always a question of fact as well as a question of law. Before you can tell what law is applicable to any particular case you must ascertain what the facts are. What are the facts with respect to Cuba? Fortunately in answering that question I need not long or tediously detain the Senate. Not only from the newspapers and other sources of information, but from Presidential messages, from the last one received, and especially and particularly from the very able report of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, we have been fully advised.

Moreover, the whole country and the whole world are familiar with the Cuban question. All who know the facts know that for more than three years now war has been in progress in that island—bloody, fierce, cruel, destructive war; destructive in an unusual degree both to life and property; and all the world knows, too, that from the very beginning of that struggle down to the present time Spain has been, as to all essential and important matters, uniformly unsuccessful. The President was justified when he said, in the sentence I read from his message a moment ago, that it is now manifest to all the world that the purpose of Spain to recover her lost sovereignty can never be attained.

She started out with the idea that she would crush that rebellion with a blow. In that behalf she concentrated in that devoted island practically the entire military power of the Kingdom. She had there at one time and for months more than 200,000 of her most capable soldiers, commanded by her generals who have been most successful in other fields; but it was all in vain. That tremendous army proved absolutely insufficient to conquer and subdue the insurgents and restore peace. Finding how unavailing that kind of effort was, she then resorted to persuasion—to diplomacy.

She tendered autonomy, a new scheme of government—home rule—a scheme with respect to which the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], speaking on this floor a few weeks ago, said it was the broadest, the most liberal, the most generous charter of liberty ever tendered by any sovereignty to a dependency. Whether it was or not is immaterial; it so impressed him. But however it may be, assuming that it was so, the people of Cuba who have risen in rebellion against the sovereign power indignantly spurned and refused it. That effort to conquer them was unavailing.

Another policy has been resorted to of which I should speak—the policy of extermination, extermination by starvation, a policy so cruel, so unmerciful, so barbarous in its practices and in its results as absolutely to shock and horrify all Christendom. More than 200,000 lives have perished in Cuba as victims of that policy alone. While we sit here this afternoon deliberating, 200,000 other lives are perishing from it.

Mr. President, notwithstanding the hurling of all this great force against the insurgents in Cuba, notwithstanding this effort of diplomacy and statecraft, this promise of reforms in government, notwithstanding the murder, for it is nothing else, of hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children in that island, to which I have referred, the insurgents stand to-day more defiant, more powerful, more assured of ultimate success and more determined to do, and dare, and die, if need be, in behalf of independence than ever before since this struggle commenced. They were never so strong as now. They control absolutely more than one-half of that territory. More than 400,000 of the population of the island recognize no government except only their civil government. They have an army in the field, trained veterans they have become, numbering thirty-five or forty thousand men, well armed and well equipped, more invincible than at any time heretofore; and as an offset to that success on the part of the Cubans that which the President indicates has been occurring with respect to Spain.

Her army of more than 200,000 men has dwindled to from fifty to sixty thousand effectives, poorly disciplined and poorly drilled, and that army of aggression and offensive operations has ceased to be an offensive and aggressive army. For months it has been only an army of occupation, holding on to the fortified cities, controlling nothing in the island beyond the range of their guns, not daring to venture out beyond the walls of those cities and remain there over night for fear old Gomez would capture them and take them off into his camp.

Mr. President, in other words, it is now plain to all the world, plain to Spain herself, for she has been for months, and is now by every steamer, recalling her troops from there, that she is no longer attended in her efforts to subdue that island by any reasonable expectation or hope of ultimate success. That being the case, such being the facts, what is the law of the case? I read from Hall on International Law. It is a standard and a modern authority. It has been written in the light not only of ancient, but of modern precedents. I shall not stop to read all of the text.

Mr. STEWART. From what page does the Senator from Ohio intend to read?

Mr. FORAKER. Page 92. He tells us that whenever the struggle on the part of the former sovereign becomes "so inadequate as to offer no reasonable ground for supposing that success may ultimately be obtained, it is not enough to keep alive the rights of the state, and so to prevent foreign countries from falling under an obligation to recognize as a state the community claiming to have become one."

I need not read other authorities, but I challenge any Senator who may enter into this discussion to find an authority inconsistent with the declaration which I have read, who is accepted as a standard authority among those who are competent to judge of international-law writers.

That is the rule; whenever the struggle on the part of the sovereign to recover lost authority, lost sovereignty, has ceased to be attended with a reasonable hope or expectation of success, then other countries have a right to recognize the independence of the opposing people. If I have been talking to any purpose, I have made it plain by the statement of facts I have given that no longer are the struggles of Spain in the Island of Cuba attended with any reasonable hope or expectation of success. That being true, Mr. President, according to the principles of international law we have a right, as the committee have reported, and it is our duty to recognize the independence of the people of Cuba.

But suppose something is lacking in the Cuban case to justify us in claiming that they are absolutely free and independent, will not that which may be lacking, whatever it may be, be supplied when the United States of America intervenes, as we propose to do by this same resolution? Intervention goes here, according to this resolution, as it does naturally, hand in hand with independence. When this demand which we all agree is to be made, that Spain shall withdraw, is made upon her, that minute she must either abdicate, which would leave the island free and independent to the satisfaction, I imagine, of the most hostile mind to the recognition of independence, or else, if she does not abdicate, she must then give battle—declare war; and what American can doubt, or does doubt, the ultimate result of war, if we are so unfortunate as to have war?

Will it not result in the absolute freedom and independence of the people of the Island of Cuba? Unquestionably so; for we expect to prosecute a war to triumphant success, if we are driven into one.

So, therefore, I say, upon authority, in strict consonance with the rules and principles of international law, it is the duty of the Government of the United States, as well as the right and privilege of this Government, now, at this very moment, when we pass a resolution to intervene, to recognize the independence of the people of that island.

Mr. President, I now wish to speak of the resolution which the minority of the committee favor. The minority of the committee are not satisfied simply to recognize the independence of the people of that island. We want to recognize also, and we appeal to Senators in this Chamber to stand by us in that proposition, the government set up by the insurgents, referred to by the President in his message as the "so-called" Cuban Republic.

We think this government ought to be recognized in the first place because if the people of Cuba are free and independent, as we have agreed unanimously in the committee they are, who made them free and independent? Did they become free and independent acting as a mob? exerting themselves in a state of anarchy? without any political organization? No! Such wonderful achievements as stand to their credit we all know could not have been accomplished without concert of action, without political organization, and they had it in the Republic of Cuba. That was their civil government, to which the military force commanded by Gomez is subordinate.

Mr. President, there are a great many other reasons why we should recognize that government. I hope I shall be able to mention a number of them.

We ought to be willing to recognize it because of its form and character. It is a republican form of government. It is a government based on a written constitution, in which the several departments of the government are established and the powers of the various departments and officials are prescribed. It has a legislative, an executive, and a judicial department. The legislative branch of the government is elected by popular vote. In Cuba, under this constitution, they have universal suffrage. Every man or woman who owes allegiance to the Cuban Government has a right to go to the ballot box and be heard in determining what the government shall be as to the personnel of its officials. The house of representatives, elected by the people in this manner, selects the President and vice-president and the cabinet; and what character of government have they selected? Let me call your attention for a moment to the character of these officials.

I have heard that government referred to here as though it were made up of a lot of inconsequential nobodies. I say, without attempting to disparage anybody, the President and vice-president of the Cuban Republic, for intellectual strength and power and vigor, for high character, for unquestioned ability, for statesmanship, will compare favorably with the President and Vice-President of the United States of America. Than Bartolome Masó there is no more accomplished gentleman, probably, on the Western Hemisphere; a man of large means, a man of large experience in public affairs, a man who—and I mention this to show his character—when the war broke out called in all his creditors and paid every one of them in cash the full sum owing, then turned over the keys to his tenants and departed for the field. He is now President of that Republic, after having served two years as vice-president under Cisneros, recently elected as such by the general assembly chosen by popular vote.

With this distinguished President is associated in office as vice-president Dr. Domingo Mendez Capote, who was professor of law in the Havana University for years before called to this position. I have taken pains to find out about these people. They are men of distinguished reputation, men of high character, men of great learning and ability; and the secretaries, if it was worth while to take the time to pass them in review, would be shown to be men of the same general class and reputation and character. So much for the personnel of the Cuban Republic.

Mr. President, what has this Government done? I said a while ago if the people of Cuba are free and independent it is because this Government has acted as their political agency in guiding and directing them to that freedom and independence. It has been stated here that it is a paper government. That is true; but it is a most excellent paper government; it is a most excellent actual government as well. Not only are all the officers elected in the manner I have indicated, but they are all in office and all serving acceptably and efficiently in the discharge of their duties. We have taken a great deal of testimony before our committee in regard to this matter, but all we have taken in that way has been spread before the public, and it should be known to Senators.

It is shown by that testimony that they have in the Island of Cuba, instituted by this paper government, a postal system which is carrying the mails to-day throughout the island into every fortified city, as well as throughout the territorial parts of the island. You can go to New York and deposit with the junta a letter addressed to anybody, in any place in Cuba, with a Cuban postage stamp attached, and it will find its destination just as surely as a letter deposited in a United States post-office will reach its destination within our territory. They not only have a postal system, but they have a fiscal system—a fiscal system which has provided tax collectors for the government throughout all that island.

The island is divided into districts and subdistricts, with a collector in each, who is authorized to collect not indiscriminately, as the enemies of the Republic of Cuba would have you believe, but according to law duly enacted, in accordance with a uniform system prescribed for all who live in that island. Each and every man is required to pay precisely alike, and when the subtreasurer of that government appointed at New York was before the committee a few days ago he showed us in his books where more than $470,000 collected by these tax collectors throughout that island had been transmitted to him as revenues of that government, every dollar of which had been collected by the officials of the Republic of Cuba, and for every dollar of which an official receipt had been given.

They have, in addition to their postal and fiscal system, a school system more creditable than any established by Spain in any place in the world. They have a compulsory system of education. Every child between certain ages is required to attend school. They have a public printing press at their capital (of which I will speak in a moment), where, by the government, school books are printed, and by the government distributed to the scholars throughout the island. All are educated according to a system of the government, a system established and conducted by the government and the representatives of the government.

Ah, but, some one says, it has no fixed capital and no seaport. There are a great many countries that have no seaports. That is of no consequence. Switzerland has not any seaport, and one or two of the South American Republics, I believe, have no seaports. Other countries have been recognized as independent states when they had no seaports. That is immaterial.

The Cubans do have a fixed capital. It is located at Cubitas. It has to be at times somewhat peripatetic, going from this to that place, but never removing any very great distance. They have stayed all the while within that one territorial subdistrict where the capital is, at Agramonte, in Cubitas, where it is located now and has been for some considerable time. They have public offices, the Presidential office, the office for each of the secretaries of state, as they are called there. Although there is a secretary of the treasury and a secretary of agriculture, etc., they are all called secretaries of state, each for his own particular department.

They have these offices, which are occupied only for official purposes. In those offices the business of the Republic is conducted. There, in those offices, the archives of the nation are preserved, and I can say here, in passing, that although they have never been made public, some day when they will be made public, when Cuba has been made free, you will find in the archives of our country, in the office of our own Secretary of State, are the official communications of the officials of the Republic of Cuba, and they are as creditable as any that have come from any country on the globe—communications of marked ability.

But, Mr. President, there are other reasons why that government, which I have undertaken to show does in fact exist, should be recognized. We should recognize it, if for nothing else, as a war measure. I do not doubt that intervention by the United States will mean war with Spain. We are bound to assume that it will. That being the case, we should, hand in hand with intervention, adopt this other resolution, recognizing not only the people, but the government also as independent, to the end that we may strengthen those who are our natural allies and who can do more for us than anybody else.

Gomez has now in the field, as I said a while ago, some 35,000 or 40,000 men. He would have many thousands more if he had guns and ammunition for them. The very moment the United States intervenes and recognizes the independence of that Republic Gomez can swell that army from 35,000 or 40,000 to 50,000, 60,000, 80,000, 100,000 men, and all we will have to do is to put guns and ammunition in their hands and they will speedily evict the Spanish battalions from the Island of Cuba. If we will only with our Navy blockade the harbors, so that they can take no more provisions in, the Cubans will speedily put an end to the war, and there will be no necessity for this Government to expose our troops to the ravages of yellow fever and the other difficulties and disadvantages that would attend a campaign in that island in the rainy season.

But, Mr. President, there is another reason still why this proposition should be incorporated into these resolutions. It is the reason why, in the original draft of the resolutions, I incorporated it. I put in there, and propose to put it back in there if I can, a declaration that the Republic of Cuba should be at once recognized by the Government of the United States because of the legal effect that would result if we did not do that. I hold that it is well settled as a principle of international law that if one country absorb another it takes not only the legal rights and advantages of that country, but it takes also the obligations of that country. We have all been told by the newspapers and otherwise—I have never seen any contradiction of it, and therefore I have assumed that it is true—that the revenues of Cuba have been, by solemn enactment of the Spanish Government, pledged to the payment of the principal and interest of $400,000,000 of Spanish-Cuban 4 per cent bonds.

Mr. President, what will be the consequence to this Government if we go down into that island treating them as in a state of anarchy, turning our back on Gomez and his government, denying that there is any government, banishing Spain from the island, taking possession of the territory, and appropriating the revenues either to ourselves or to "a stable" government that the United States of America through the President is to establish in that island? What would be the consequence? We would take the rights and privileges and advantages attaching to the territory and we would take the debts fastened on it also, just as if you buy a piece of property that is mortgaged, you take it subject to the mortgage and must pay the mortgage or lose your property. That is the legal proposition that I assert. I am not going to stop here to read authorities, but I will do so, if it should be challenged.

Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator from Ohio allow a question?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. ELKINS. If Gomez takes the island, what will become of the mortgage?

Mr. FORAKER. It does not make any difference to us what happens if Gomez takes it; but I will tell you what will happen. If Gomez takes the island by revolution, the whole obligation is wiped out, for those who successfully revolutionize start anew, as revolutionists have started anew from the beginning of the world, except only as to obligations which they themselves might create.

Mr. ELKINS. Let me ask the Senator one further question. If we should take the island by war, would not those obligations be wiped out as well?

Mr. FORAKER. Do you want to take the island by war?

Mr. ELKINS. That is not the question.

Mr. FORAKER. It is the question that I put. Why do you ask me to discuss propositions not involved in this debate? It is because, in my judgment, this intervention is to be deliberately turned from intervention on the ground of humanity into an aggressive conquest of territory.

Mr. ELKINS. That does not answer the question.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not care. I am not going to answer it now. I am not going to answer it because it does not belong in this case. I can not discuss every kind of a question that a Senator by an interrogatory may seek to put before me, especially not when in the very next breath he will refuse or at least evade to say whether he wants this Government to acquire that island by conquest or not.

I say here, as a principle of international law, if the United States Government goes down there and drives Spain out and puts somebody else in, forming "a stable government" of her making, that "stable government" will become responsible, and the United States of America will become responsible. I will answer you further now. You would not answer me. I thought probably if I dallied with you a while you would. If the United States of America takes that island by intermeddling, as writers on international law call it, with the affairs of another, she, too, will become responsible, and what is the consequence? The United States of America steps in behind four hundred million of Spanish-Cuban 4 per cent bonds. You do not admit the proposition. It is possible that it is open to some debate. I will concede for the sake of the argument it is. But who holds these $400,000,000 of bonds? I understand they are held largely in Germany, largely in France, and largely in the United States.

Does anybody imagine, Mr. President, if we should go into Cuba and there establish a stable government for which we would be responsible, that the present Emperor of Germany would hesitate one moment to say to the people of the United States, "You have taken by conquest the revenues that Spain had a right to pledge and did pledge to pay the principal and interest of bonds due to my subjects, and I will now look to you?" Does anybody doubt that he would do it? No; nobody does who judges without bias, I feel free to assert. And if Spain and France would make such a demand on the United States, the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, I imagine, would be one of the first to say, "We ought to pay up rather than have any fighting."

Mr. ELKINS. I do not think it is fair to put a question to me and not allow me to answer it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. ELKINS. I say to the Senator that I would not. There is no soundness in his proposition. There is no authority in the world, and I challenge the Senator to show anything that gives authority, to support his proposition in law—any legal authority.

Mr. FORAKER. I have a very good one right here.

Mr. ELKINS. Read it.

Mr. FORAKER. And I can give you a great many other authorities as they have been given by writers on the subject of international law, for there is not one, from Grotius down to Lawrence, who does not assert that doctrine. Hall says, at page 105:

> When a state ceases to exist by absorption in another state, the latter in the same way is the inheritor of all local rights, obligations, and property.

The whole state is not here absorbed, but that which is to be absorbed is that which is subject to the lien.

I might cite you many more authorities if I had thought it worth while to bring them here and tax the patience of the Senate with them.

Mr. ELKINS. That does not answer the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. FORAKER. I am always glad to hear from the Senator from West Virginia, for he is so very good-natured. But, Mr. President, to go back to what I was discussing, I was just about saying, suppose, for the sake of the argument, the Senator from West Virginia is right to the extent that it is a debatable proposition, we must consider this as a practical as well as a theoretical question. Treating it as a practical question, do you suppose that the rulers of Germany, France, and other countries whose subjects are interested as holders of these bonds would hesitate to call us to account? I do not hesitate to say they would. I do not hesitate to believe they would; and then we would have other and far more serious complications. I want to avoid them.

If we recognize the independence of the Republic of Cuba, that liability is avoided. We absolutely estop everybody from making such a demand upon us; we take no responsibility. Those people, according to our resolutions, have already accomplished their independence without any help from this country, but rather in spite of all this country has done to patrol our coasts in the interests of Spain. They are already in a situation where they can set up their government, and all we do in going there is to recognize the existence of that government and act with our natural allies.

Ah, but says somebody, when you go there, if you recognize the existence of that government, you are compelled to report to Gomez, and there will be a question at once between General Miles and General Gomez as to who should command. If there be any government in the Island of Cuba to-day, it is either the Spanish Government or it is the Republic of Cuba, and when General Miles goes to Cuba I would rather have him report to General Gomez than to General Blanco.

Mr. President, for all these reasons, which I am conscious I have most imperfectly advanced, I believe that it is the duty of the United States Government this very day, not only to intervene, but at the same time to recognize the independence of the people of that island and the independence of the government which the Cubans have established.

I for one say to you frankly I would be ashamed to see the United States recognizing the independence of the people of Cuba and in the same resolution turning their backs upon heroic, grand old Gomez and his compatriots. For my part my voice is against any such proposition.

Mr. President, I have not at any time had any trouble in my mind about independence and intervention, but I have had this kind of a trouble in my mind: The trouble has been whether it should be independence and intervention or independence and a declaration of war outright. I think, logically speaking, it ought to be a declaration of war, and I would be standing here arguing for such a declaration if I were not of the opinion that armed intervention will give us an opportunity to suitably punish Spain for the destruction of the Maine and 266 of our officers and sailors. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Order must be observed in the galleries or they will be cleared.

Mr. FORAKER. We have been told, Mr. President, that the board of inquiry appointed by our Government by its report has estopped us from such a declaration. I dispute it. It is true that the board of inquiry found that they could not tell what person or persons were responsible for that disaster, but the context shows that in that connection they had reference only to the question what person or persons pressed the button that sent the electric current on its fateful mission; and that, Mr. President, is immaterial in the light of the other facts unequivocally found by that board of inquiry.

That board of inquiry has officially found—and it is a most conservative report throughout; as the President well says in his message, all Americans have absolute confidence in the truthfulness of it—that board of inquiry found that our ship went into that harbor on a friendly mission; that the Spanish authorities were advised in advance of her coming; that she was coming not for warlike purposes, but only on a mission of peace, to cultivate better relations with Spain—a courteous visit in recognition of the friendly relations, of which we have heard so much, between Spain and this country. The court further find that when our ship reached the entrance to the harbor she was taken in charge by a Spanish official—the harbor pilot—and by him towed to buoy No. 4 and there made fast, and there stationed during her stay in that harbor, and that while she was there stationed she was destroyed by a submarine mine. That is the finding.

What, Mr. President, is a submarine mine? Did any Senator ever hear of any private individual having submarine mines on sale, or of any private individual handling submarine mines, especially in a territory where war is present? And does not every Senator know that under the laws then in force in Havana, by the edict of Weyler issued on the 16th day of February, 1896, no private individual could have in his possession any kind of an explosive, not even a pound of gunpowder, without being liable to the death penalty? Do you imagine that any private individuals, with that kind of a law in force there, were engaged in handling submarine mines?

No, it is an absolute absurdity, it seems to me, for us to imagine that the submarine mine that destroyed the battle ship Maine was anything else than a governmental implement and agency of war.

Suppose, for illustration, instead of that ship being destroyed by a submarine mine, as she was, she had been sunk by a shot fired from Morro Castle, under the guns of which she was buoyed. Would any Senator in such instance imagine that there could be any question about that piece of artillery being a governmental agency and implement of war? Would anybody stand up and question that it was a governmental agency under the control of Government officials, and that the Spanish Government could be held liable by us for the result of the discharge of that gun as a hostile act of war?

Mr. President, the gun was not any more a governmental agency than this mine was. The gun was not any more under the control of the Government than this mine was. The gun was not any more subject to governmental control and to be discharged by governmental agencies than was this mine.

But if it had been the case of a discharge from a gun, what would Spain have done? Why, the whole world would have recognized that we were bound to assume that it was an act of war. Spain would have recognized it. How could she have escaped from the consequences? Only in one way, and then she would have remained liable for all damages that occurred. She could have escaped from the conclusion that it was an act of war by immediately disavowing and immediately establishing by incontrovertible proof that it was an accident, if such a thing were possible.

Mr. President, the same rule that would apply in the case of the gun does apply, and did apply, in this instance. And, Mr. President, the significant thing is that Spain admitted by her conduct that it applied. What did Spain do? Instantly she disavowed, just as she would have done in the case of the gun, and instantly sought to establish her innocence by proving that it was an accident.

No wonder, Mr. President, that she seized upon the theory that it was an accident when our own Government was everywhere proclaiming that it was an accident. She sought to establish that it was an accident; she pitched her defense on that proposition; she took her testimony; she made an official report. It is before the Senate. She finds in that report that the Maine was destroyed, not by an external agency, but by an accident, by the explosion of one of her magazines.

Mr. President, that report is a lie to the living and a libel upon the dead. It is on its face absolutely and conclusively false. There is one circumstance that will forever keep it branded as such, as it now is, and that is the fact that the keel plates of that ship after the explosion were found 34 feet above where they should have been found as the ship rests on the bottom of that harbor if there had been no explosion, and the bottom plates of the ship are bent upward like an inverted V, like my hand is [illustrating]. Do you think an explosion from within would have bent the keel plates upward, would have drawn them up through the decks on that ship a distance of 34 feet, and would have bent them in that manner? No; you can not think that until the laws of nature have been changed. They have not been changed yet. They were still in operation then.

Now, what is the effect of this fact? Spain recognized that she must make a defense. She chose to call it an accident; she so reported. This one fact—the present condition of the keel plates—absolutely wrecks and destroys her whole defense as completely as the Maine was destroyed by her submarine mine. What is the result? The result of it is that Spain stands to-day convicted by her own effort at defense, convicted in the presence of the nations of the earth, of that hideous and cowardly crime.

What is our duty in view of it? Mr. President, we owe it to the brave men dead to vindicate their reputations from the brutal charge that they died of their own negligence. We owe it, Mr. President, to the splendid record of the American Navy to preserve it from the tarnish that is sought to be put upon it. We owe it, Mr. President, to our own good name among the nations of the earth that the perpetrators of such a cruel outrage shall not go unwhipped of justice.

No nation can afford to pass by such an affront as that in silence. This is not a case for the application of the Scriptural injunction about the turning of the other cheek, but it is a case, Mr. President, for the application of that other Scriptural injunction, "An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth."

It is not morality, it is not Christianity, it is not religion, it is not common decency, it is not common sense, but only a mandlin sentimentality to talk in the presence of such circumstances and facts about the horrors of war. War is horrible, always to be deplored, and ever to be avoided if it can be avoided consistently with the dignity and the honor and the good name of the nation. But, Mr. President, much as war is to be deplored, it is a thousand times better to have it in a case like this than to be written down before all the nations of the earth as pusillanimous—as wanting in pluck and courage.

Yes, Mr. President, business interests may be interfered with, loss of life may occur, all apprehended evils may result, but no matter what the cost, in the presence of this great commanding duty we must go forward. The time, I repeat, for diplomacy has passed. The time for action has come. Let the doubting, the hesitating, the opposing, go to the rear, while the virile, strong-minded, patriotic, liberty-loving masses of the American people, coming from all the sections and all pursuits and avocations of life, rally as one man around our gallant Army and Navy, and taking the flag of our country carry it on to triumphant victory. [Applause in the galleries.]

A victory, Mr. President, for civilization over barbarism; a victory for the right and capacity of man to govern himself; a victory for the Western Hemisphere; a victory for Cuba; a victory for freedom and liberty and independence; a victory worthy of the descendants of the heroic men who achieved our own independence, and worthy of the successors of those heroic men who have since preserved and perpetuated our priceless heritage. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. LODGE obtained the floor.

Mr. HALE. I offer as a substitute for the pending resolution what I send to the desk, which I ask may be printed and go over with the joint resolution.

Mr. CARTER and Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read.

Mr. HALE. Let the substitute be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

The President is authorized, directed, and empowered to intervene at once to restore peace on the Island of Cuba, and secure to the people thereof a firm, stable, and independent government of their own, and is authorized to use the Army and naval forces of the United States to secure this end.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the Order of Business, whatever it may be, be laid before the Senate. We are proceeding without any order at all, and I suggest to the Presiding Officer that it is well for us to know what the business before the Senate is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business before the Senate at the hour of 2 o'clock is the bill (S. 2680) amending "An act granting additional quarantine powers and imposing additional duties upon the Marine-Hospital Service," approved February 15, 1893.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that that matter be laid over informally, that the Senator from Massachusetts may proceed with his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to laying aside Senate bill 2680? Unanimous consent appears to be given. It is given, and the Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, during the entire session, since the first of December, and more especially since the destruction of the Maine fell with a great shock upon the people of the United States, I have felt it my duty as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which I have the honor to belong, to maintain an absolute silence on all matters connected with the questions pending between this country and Spain. I have broken through that rule on but one occasion, and that was when I counseled in this Chamber silence and patience until we could hear the report of the court of inquiry. Neither by speech here nor by interview or publication elsewhere have I broken the rule which I imposed upon myself.

But, Mr. President, the moment has now come when the committee to which I belong has made its report, and I feel it to be my duty to state the reasons which govern me and control my vote at this great crisis, and to try to make them plain to the people whom I have the very great and high honor to represent.

Mr. President, I think there is one point on which all men in this country are agreed to-day, no matter how they may differ on one proposition or another, and that agreement is that this situation must end. We can not go on indefinitely with this strain, this suspense, and this uncertainty, this tottering upon the verge of war. It is killing to business.

It is ruinous to our people in a thousand ways. It is discreditable to our Government and our country. If we are not to take action in regard to Cuba in order to bring this situation to an end, then let us stand up in the face of the world and say that we wash our hands of the whole affair; let us say that we will not intervene to save the starving, to put an end to hostilities, and that we will turn the case of the Maine over to a referee. If we are not prepared to do that, then let us act the other way. But whatever happens, let us end this state of unendurable suspense. That, I believe, Mr. President, is the one great desire of the entire country.

The President has submitted this momentous question to the Congress of the United States. In his hands are placed by the Constitution all the diplomatic functions of the Government. He alone can address foreign powers; he alone can carry on correspondence through his ministers and officers. Congress has no diplomatic functions whatever. The President has told us that diplomacy is exhausted, and he has handed the case over to us. What power have we got? We have but one, Mr. President. The Constitution gives to Congress—I mean to both Houses constituting the entire Congress—but one power in relation to foreign countries—the last great weapon in the armory of nations—the war power.

When a President of the United States says to Congress, as President McKinley has said, that he can go no further with diplomacy in a controversy with a foreign nation, and remits that question to the Congress of the United States, he invites them to use the only weapon they possess. The mere fact of remitting the question to Congress is invoking Congress to use the most awful power which the Constitution has conferred upon it.

That is the situation in which we stand to-day, Mr. President. We here can open no new negotiations with Madrid; we can enter on no correspondence with any other nation on the face of the earth. All that we can do is to exercise the one great power of peace or war. The President has asked us to exert that power, and in a certain way. He has invited us to exercise it by clothing him with the power to intervene by force of arms in order to produce certain results.

My deep desire, Mr. President, and all the small influence that I may possess, has been given throughout to the one object of sustaining the President of the United States and seeking in every possible way to preserve unity between the Congress and the Executive, for I believe, when we are face to face with a foreign power, that there is one duty that overrides all others, higher than politics and higher than everything else, and that is that the Congress and the people and the Executive of the United States should stand absolutely together. And now, Mr. President, when the President comes to Congress and invokes our aid in a controversy with a foreign country and asks us to give him power to intervene, I desire that that great power of war should be given to him in that way.

I am against a declaration of war, but I favor giving the President the power to intervene. I am against recognizing the government of the insurgent republic because the President of the United States, in his high responsibility, has advised Congress strongly against it. I will not myself part from that unity which I consider so much more important than aught else, and differ on that point.

I do not care to argue here the question of recognizing or not recognizing the government of the insurgents. Powerful arguments can be made both ways. We have heard one in the message of the President; we have heard another to-day from the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] on the other side. We heard but yesterday in the Foreign Relations Committee the advice of General Lee, who has conferred such honor upon the United States by the manner in which he has represented this country at Havana, and his advice is that we should not recognize the insurgent government.

Therefore, Mr. President, without arguing that point further, I beg to say that I stand with the majority of the committee and with the President of the United States in opposing the recognition of the insurgent government at this time. It can be done, if necessary, at any moment. The President has nothing to do but to ask Mr. Palma to the White House, and the Cuban Republic stands up erect and recognized. We may safely trust that power to the President.

I said, sir, that the President has asked us for intervention. The committee have given it to him. It was not the form of resolution which I personally preferred. I voted for another in the committee. But, Mr. President, what I desired more than any special form of resolution was the unity of action of the Government of the United States in the crisis to which we have arrived. Therefore I voted to bring these resolutions into the Senate; voted to do it with all the other members of the committee. Nor do I think, Mr. President, that there is much use in differing about the words in which we order intervention. We have been wandering too long as a country amid the delusions and snares of diplomacy. Let us now come out into the clear light of day and look facts squarely in the face.

When we authorize the President to intervene and use the Army and Navy of the United States, whether we do it in the language of the message, or in the language of the House of Representatives or in the language of the Senate resolution, we create a state of war. Let us not deceive ourselves at this solemn hour. Forms of words are of but little moment in a crisis like this. It is the great central fact that concerns the people to-day. The President has asked us to mail his arm to strike with the Army and the Navy of the United States; to authorize him to go down into Cuba and enforce the pacification of the island. He has asked us to authorize him to set up a government there which shall be a stable government, and a government "capable of observing international obligations." I quote the President's own words.

What kind of government can alone observe international obligations? Only an independent government, Mr. President. Therefore the President of the United States asks us to authorize him to use the Army and the Navy to stop the fighting in Cuba and establish an independent government in that island. How can there be an independent government in Cuba while Spain is there? It is an impossibility. The recommendations of the message mean that Spain must leave that island, and I for one think that if that is the purpose of the message, as it clearly is, there is no harm and much good in telling the truth. If we intervene, we do not go there to take Gomez by the throat and make him stop fighting. We go there to put Spain out of that island, for in no other way can we create a government capable of observing its international obligations.

The President has asked Congress to sustain him in that policy in its broad general lines. As I have sustained him hitherto in every step that he has taken, so far as my very humble influence went, I sustain him now when he asks us to give him this last great power of the Constitution. Therefore, Mr. President, when we vote to give the President of the United States power to intervene in the affairs of another country with the Army and Navy of the United States, we clothe him with the war power, and we had better face that great responsibility and look it in the eye like men and not attempt to shrink from what it means and try feebly to pretend that it is not there.

No man can be more averse to war than I, no one can dread more than I any act which will plunge the country into war. Mr. President, such measures as I have voted for in past years in the Senate since the Cuban crisis has been upon the country I have supported not merely because I thought they made for the interests of the insurgents, with whom I sympathize in the strongest possible manner, because they are fighting for freedom, but because I thought then, as I think now, that they were the true road to the preservation of peace.

If two years ago we had recognized the belligerency of the Cuban insurgents they would have been able to raise money, to hoist a flag at sea, and open a port; they would then have won their independence, in my judgment, and we never should have been involved. If one year ago last January we had recognized their independence, again they would have been able to raise money, to open a port, and to have established their independence themselves. I so believed then; I so believe now. Both those propositions passed by the Senate of the United States were smothered elsewhere by a wisdom which I shall not question; but I think that each of those refusals to act kept alive the Cuban difficulty, and the longer it was kept alive the nearer and the surer war came to us.

I have also for many years advocated a powerful Navy and strong coast defenses. I have advocated them because I believed that in them was the great guaranty of peace. Mr. President, if we had to-day, as we ought to have, twenty battle ships and a hundred torpedo boats, there never would have been a Cuban question; we should have been so ready and so strong that we could have laid our hands on the shoulder of Spain and said, "You must stop;" and the contest would have been so hopeless that it never would have been entered upon. Thousands of men who fill graves in Cuba to-day, tortured into them by starvation, would be alive, and the Maine would still ride the seas. But, Mr. President, more conservative principles prevailed and we have not the large Navy we ought to have.

I believe in preparation for war as Washington advocated it; I believe in a rigid exclusion from America of any European extension, which was the great doctrine of the generation which followed Washington. These principles have been scoffed at as the doctrine of "jingoes." Ah, Mr. President, as Coleridge says, "Old faiths often become new heresies." If we had clung to the old faiths, if we had kept our Navy and our defenses as Washington advised, if we had looked a little further ahead into what the Monroe doctrine meant, we should not be standing on the verge of war to-day. We failed, as I believe, in certain obvious duties, and the inexorable law of compensation has brought the inevitable penalty to our doors.

Mr. President, we are not in this crisis by an accident. We have not been brought here by chance or by clamorous politicians or by yellow journals. We are face to face with Spain to-day in the fulfillment of a great movement which has run through the centuries. Out of the war which Spain wages and the manner in which she wages it have come starvation and the destruction of the Maine. The war comes out of Spanish misgovernment and Spanish corruption. That corruption is not of yesterday. It is very, very old. It has cost Spain all her continental colonies. It existed two hundred years ago. You can see it all portrayed in that beautiful picture of character and manners which Le Sage drew in the history of Gil Blas of Santillane. Spain was corrupt then; it was misgoverned then; and out of it has come to-day the Cuban war.

Even at this moment the corruption which Le Sage described is worse than ever. Spain is on her deathbed, buried in debt, bleeding at every vein from the revolutions in her colonies, and her officers and officials rob her, dying, as she is, in the eyes of the world. We asked General Lee yesterday when he was before us if the $600,000 said to have been appropriated by Spain for the relief of the reconcentrados would reach them or would be spent on the Spanish soldiers—for they are starving, too—and his reply was, "It will never reach either of them; the officials will take it all on the way." That is what is going on in Spain, just as it was when Gil Blas had his adventures. That is why Cuba has rebelled.

Mr. President, this long process of Spanish decay began far back, three hundred years ago, and the vast empire of Charles V has been dying through all these centuries. The men who first struck at it, even in its pitch of pride, were the men of the dikes and the marshes of Holland. The men who next struck it and brought it down were the men of English blood, the English seamen of the sixteenth century. They fought it by an instinct, because it stood for all that meant oppression, bigotry, cruelty, and terror. Those men of Holland and England fought it because they stood for the principles of liberty and of free government.

In our veins runs the blood of Holland and the blood of England. If after all the centuries it comes to us, much as we pray to avert it, to meet Spain face to face in war, it is because we are there in obedience to a greater movement than any man can hope to control. We are there because we represent the spirit of liberty and the spirit of the new time, and Spain is over against us because she is mediæval, cruel, dying. We are not there by chance. We are there because we stand now for just the same principles for which the men stood who followed William the Silent and sailed with Drake; and if this terrible thing—this awful curse of war—must come upon us, then we can only repeat with Lincoln the words of the second inaugural, "The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."

Mr. President, we have exhausted the resources of diplomacy; we have made every effort that could be made. The President has been patient, more than patient. He has used every possible effort to secure a settlement at once honorable to the country and in the interest of freedom and humanity. Every effort that he has made has failed, and, saying so, he has committed the question to us.

We are told that Spain has recalled the concentration edict. We were told that last November, and yet the people have been in the pens dying ever since. We were told that Weyler's edict had been revoked then, and yet starvation has gone on. We hear of another proclamation for another revocation of that same edict which had been already revoked, and the people are dying in Havana now and in other towns, and the President himself concludes his message with a request for money to feed the starving.

What does the Spanish order of $600,000 amount to? It is a fraud—an absolute fraud. It is a fraud like their armistice, which invites the insurgents to come in and lay down their arms. There is nothing in it at all but baffling snares, and every man who has been in the Island of Cuba and comes before the Committee on Foreign Relations swears to the same thing.

Mr. President, we can not, in my opinion, allow that fire to burn longer at our doors. We can no longer permit those people to starve to death, brought to that hideous torture by a war measure of Spain. We can not longer suffer our commerce to be ruined, our property destroyed, our business to be darkened and depressed. Spain has refused every valid suggestion that would bring any solution, and she has given us a stone where we have asked for bread.

We can not accept, Mr. President, conditions of peace which would degrade us in the eyes of the world, and, what is infinitely more important, in our own eyes. If we were to do so, we should bring evils in the train of such a yielding which no man can estimate. We should heap wars upon the generations yet unborn which no man can contemplate without a shudder, for we should give to the world an invitation to step into the Western Hemisphere and do anything they please to the people of the United States.

There are some things, Mr. President, horrible as war is, worse than war and better than money. A nation's honor is one thing, and her duty to humanity is another.

They say that they are not our own people. They are just outside the walls of the house we call our own. Ah, Mr. President, when they say to me, "Are you your brother's keeper?" I respond, "Yes; we are the keeper of those people in Cuba," for we announced fifty years ago to the whole world that the Cuban question was an American question. We drew a ring fence around that island, and we told the people of the earth that no one should interfere there except ourselves. Here we stand, shutting out every other nation and allowing Spain to butcher those people after her own fashion. There is a great responsibility. We can not escape it, and if we fail to meet it we shall pay the awful price for our failure, as nations always do.

The sentiment of the American people in my judgment is for peace. We are essentially a peace-loving, peace-cherishing people. But there is a sentiment in the American people that is above and beyond their love of peace. I mean among the great mass of our people whose eyes are not blinded by the glitter of too much wealth. Among those people there is a strong sentiment for peace always, but it can only be peace with honor. They cherish very deeply the honor of their country all the more, perhaps, if they have not many other possessions to cherish—the pride in being an American is very dear to them—and they do not want to see that name tarnished or brought to ignominy or dishonor.

The sentiment of my own State and my own people I have known and know now is for peace. They do not wish to see this country plunged into an unnecessary war, but neither would they see the country degraded. They would not see it dragged in the dust before the eyes of the world. If they can not have peace with honor, then they will meet war in a brave and noble spirit, as Massachusetts always has met her trials, from Concord to Baltimore.

If war must be—I hope and pray that it may yet be avoided—no nation ever went to war on higher grounds or from nobler or more disinterested motives. War is here, if it is here, by the act of Spain. We have grasped no man's territory. We have taken no man's property. We have invaded no man's rights. We do not ask their lands. We do not ask their money. We ask peace in that unhappy island—peace and freedom, not for ourselves, but for others. It is an unselfish, a pure, a noble demand; and if war does come, then, Mr. President, we do not fear to meet it. We will meet it so that the curse of Spain shall never rest again on any part of the Western Hemisphere. We do not want war; we would do anything in honor to avoid it; but if it must come, it will be a war that will prevent Spain from ever bringing misery, death, and ruin to Cuba, and agitation, unhappiness, loss, and war to the United States.

And now, Mr. President, what of the Maine? I suppose a good argument can be made that that is a legal question; that there are disputed facts; that it does not do to get too excited about it; but I am so sentimental, I am so merely human, that that ship is nearer my heart than anything else. Suppose she had gone down to her death in an English harbor, blown up as she was, carrying her men with her; what do you think would have been the voice of England—the land of Nelson? I believe if it had happened in an English port England would have said, in a great and generous spirit, "We regard this with horror; we believe that it must have been an accident, but it happened in our harbor under our flag. If you think otherwise, name the reparation that you want." Such, Mr. President, I believe would have been the reply of England; such I believe would have been our reply or that of any of the great powers.

Look now at Spain. She has done nothing but slander officers and sailors of the Maine, dead and living. Her ambassador to Rome said but a week ago to all Europe, in a published interview, that that ship went down because her captain neglected her and was not on board. Notorious as the sinking of the ship is the fact that Captain Sigsbee was there, and was the last man to leave is equally well known, and yet the Spanish ambassador to Rome tells that lying story to the world. Last Sunday the Spanish ambassador in London announced also to all the world through the columns of the press that the Maine was blown up from inside because our officers neglected their duty, feasting on shore when they should have died at their posts. That is typical of the Spanish answer, and it is a coarse insult.

They agreed on their story that the ship was blown up by accident before they even looked at her hull. We have the evidence of Captain Sigsbee before our committee as to the character of the examination which the Spaniards made—trivial, slight, careless, done for a form, to back up a story which they had already made up their minds to stand by and put forth. They have never even tried to prove that there were no mines in the harbor, and an accused man or nation who refuses to offer exculpatory evidence convicts himself. That has been the attitude of Spain—indifferent, insulting, ignoble—toward an awful disaster happening in her own harbor.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from Massachusetts please add right here that the death of our sailors and the destruction of our ship, according to General Lee's testimony, was celebrated with banquets and champagne by the Spanish officers in Cuba?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Maine for recalling to me the testimony of General Lee on that point yesterday. Where so much has been told it is impossible to remember all. They rejoiced in Havana, and they explained the explosion by throwing it upon our officers, slandering their character and denying their words.

I have examined that testimony from beginning to end; I have heard the evidence of Captain Sigsbee, of the torpedo experts of the Navy Department, and yesterday of the consul-general, Fitzhugh Lee. We know that that ship was anchored at a buoy never used for public ships of war, certainly not for many years; we know that she was anchored there by a Spanish official pilot; we know that the night she was blown up she had swung into a position where she had never ridden before and the only position where her broadside commanded the fort; we have the statement of General Lee and of Captain Sigsbee as to their profound belief; we can not put our hand upon the man who pressed the button, but we know that it was a submarine mine either put there for that special purpose or to defend the fortress, and Spain has never attempted to show that no mine was there.

On those unquestioned facts every man has the right to make up his own mind. Every man is entitled to his own belief, and I state mine after fifty days of careful study and a consideration of every fact. I have no more doubt about it than that I am now standing in the Senate of the United States—that that ship was blown up by a Government mine, fired by, or with the connivance of, Spanish officials. I do not say it was done by General Blanco. I exonerate him fully on the statement of General Lee. I do not say that it was done by the Government itself, but it could have been done only by experts, only by men in control of Government mines, only by men who had their hands upon the Government machinery. Others may reason from those facts as they please. To me they bear but one interpretation, and that is that the Maine went to her death by Spanish treachery in the harbor of Havana and Spaniards exulted and feasted when the black deed was done.

Mr. President, I suppose it may be urged that it is proper that we should negotiate and arbitrate, but whenever I think of that solution there comes to my mind the lines of Lowell, written at another period, a very dark time in this country—written in the homely New England dialect:

> Ef I turn mad dogs loose, John,
> On your front-parlor stairs,
> Would it jest meet your views, John,
> To wait an' sue their heirs?

Ah, Mr. President, it does not seem to me that this is a case for negotiation. It would have been the case for a generous opponent to have put himself greatly in the right by his treatment of it, but it seems to me we can not any more negotiate about it than a man can negotiate about an insult to his mother. What could we take if we did arbitrate? Are we going to take money for those dead men of ours?

I suppose again that I am very impracticable and very sentimental, but the idea revolts me. At the close of the civil war the great war governor of Massachusetts found his practice scattered, his small accumulations and savings gone, because he had given his time, as, indeed, he gave his life, to the service of the State and the country. It was known how much he had suffered in his practice and his purse, and there was a story circulated in the papers that his friends intended to make him collector of the port, the most highly paid office in the State of Massachusetts. The day that item of news appeared a friend of Governor Andrew met him and said to him, "Well, Governor, are you going to take the collectorship?" He paused a moment, then looked up suddenly and said, "I have stood for four years as high priest between the horns of the altar; I have poured out upon it the best blood of Massachusetts; I can not take money for that."

Mr. President, we can not take money for the dead men of the Maine. There is only one reparation. There is only one monument to raise over that grave, and that is free Cuba and peace in that island. That is a worthy monument, worthy of men who died under the flag they loved, died, in the cold language of the law, "in the line of duty."

They say we can not go to war about the Maine. Perhaps not. We are told that it is an incident. So be it. It is the outgrowth of the conditions in Cuba; it is the outgrowth of that Spanish rule; it is the outcome of that Spanish war, and it calls upon us to end the causes that made it possible. The men who were hurled from the sleep of life into the sleep of death call upon us from their graves to root out forever the causes which made their slaughter possible.

We are told that we must not go to war on the narrow ground of revenge. Revenge is an ugly word, although Bacon tells us that it is nothing but wild justice. No, not revenge; but we must have reparation for the Maine. We can not as a nation belittle that case or refuse to demand a great and shining atonement for our dead sailors. If we allow that to drop aside, to pass away into an endless tangle of negotiation and law and discussion, we are lost to all sense of brotherhood; we are lost to all love of kith and kin; our uniform will no longer be an honor and a protection; it will be a disgrace and danger to wear it.

Your men on your ships are sullen to-day because they think that the Government is not behind them. There are mutterings among the men who wear your uniform because they think you have not striven to redress the awful slaughter of their comrades. You must maintain the honor of the uniform and of the flag under which the men died. Surely, there never was a more righteous cause than this for any nation to ask for justice. That gigantic murder, the last spasm of a corrupt and dying society, which carried down our ship and our men, cries aloud for justice.

Mr. President, I care but little what form of words we adopt. I am ready to yield my opinions to those about me in Congress. Still more ready am I to defer to the wishes of the Executive, who stands and must stand at our head; but I want now to arm that Executive with powers which shall enable him in the good providence of God to bring peace to Cuba and exact justice for the Maine. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair again lays before the Senate the bill (S. 2680) amending "An act granting additional quarantine powers and imposing additional duties upon the Marine-Hospital Service," approved February 15, 1893.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside to enable the Senator from Kentucky to address the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside to enable the Senator from Kentucky to address the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, like the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] I felt it to be my duty during the past two months to take no step and to give out no utterance calculated to embarrass the Executive in dealing with the difficult situation presented by our relations with Spain on account of events transpiring in Cuba; but when the message came the other day to the Congress, I felt I was relieved from all obligation to further silence. The President has justly said, "This question is now with Congress," and "the responsibility is a solemn one." I feel I ought to meet that responsibility as I understand it, and to discharge my duty in accordance with my convictions upon this most important occasion.

There has been a disposition to speak of the President's message as looking to the ends of peace, but that message and the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs strike me as making recommendations which must necessarily lead to war. The message asks the Congress of the United States—

> To authorize and empower the President to take measures to secure a full and final termination of hostilities between the Government of Spain and the people of Cuba, and to secure in the island the establishment of a stable government, capable of maintaining order and observing its international obligations, insuring peace and tranquillity and the security of its citizens as well as our own, and to use the military and naval forces of the United States as may be necessary for these purposes.

The President understood, as the country understands, that to use the Army and Navy for such a purpose is war. To grant his request, whether in the language of the joint resolution or in any language that may be selected, will be equivalent to a declaration of war against Spain. The President understood, and all of us understand, that we can not abdicate the war-making power to the President, and that to comply with his request will be to authorize him, in the execution of a war power, to do those things which he may deem necessary to attain the end sought to be accomplished.

The joint resolution reported this morning will be a declaration of war as soon as it shall receive legislative and Executive sanction. We can not expect Spain to yield to the demand we propose to make. That demand, with the direction to the President to enforce it with the Army and Navy, falls short in no respect of a declaration of war.

The joint resolution declares that the people of Cuba are and of right ought to be a free and independent people, and to that extent I agree with the committee. But, Mr. President, how are the people of Cuba to utilize their independence and freedom except through some authorized and organized agency? When we take our Army and Navy to Cuba, when we drive the Spaniards from the island and establish the independence, so far as Spain is concerned, of the people of Cuba, what is the next step we are to take? Driving out the Spaniards and refusing to recognize any other authority, we will hold Cuba, for the time being, under the war power, and if the Cuban people shall ever come together for the purpose of exercising their right of self-government they will come under our sanction at our behest, and under our direction, and not as a free people, acting through their own agencies.

We are told that this is not the time to deal with the revolutionary government now in existence in the Island of Cuba; that the time may come when that government ought to be recognized as a belligerent; that the time may come when the independence of that government ought to be recognized; but that its recognition at this time would involve us in complications and difficulties from which it might be difficult to escape in the future. The refusal to recognize the belligerency of that government at this time will most indubitably bring about difficulties of the most serious character and with which we may not be able successfully to deal in the future.

We make war to liberate Cuba, we make war upon the Spanish Government, and we drive the Spanish from the island, and the question then arises, How are we to treat, what disposition is to be made of the revolutionary Republic of Cuba, which has been maintaining itself during the last three years? Will our armies go to Cuba not only to fight the Spaniards, but to fight every class of people who assume the right to govern Cuba?

If that be the case, why not say so? If that be not the case, why leave in doubt that which ought to be made clear?

Mr. President, forcible intervention means what? The President of the United States says:

> The forcible intervention of the United States as a neutral to stop the war, according to the large dictates of humanity and following many historical precedents where neighboring states have interfered to check the hopeless sacrifices of life by internecine conflicts beyond their borders, is justifiable on rational grounds.

And so say we all.

> It involves, however—

Says the President—

> hostile constraint upon both the parties to the contest as well to enforce a truce as to guide the eventual settlement.

"Hostile constraint upon both the parties!" Does the resolution reported by the committee mean that the President may, in his discretion, put hostile constraint upon the Cuban Government in order that the will of the Cuban people may only manifest itself through the action of the American Government? With hostile constraint upon the Cuban Republic, and with the Spanish soldiers and authority expelled, will we not hold the island as a conquered province, and, whatever government it may establish, will it not receive such government at our hands and through our grace?

We are told that we can not acknowledge the independence of the Cuban Republic, because independence is a fact, and that that republic has not established itself as an independent government actually controlling the people of the Island of Cuba; that we can not recognize its belligerency, because it has not acquired that degree of consistency and power which would entitle it by the rules of international law to recognition as a belligerent. The President quotes from the messages of Presidents Grant and Jackson and Cleveland to show that the Cuban Republic is not entitled under international law to recognition either as an independent state or as a belligerent power.

Mr. President, having reached the point at which we declare war against Spain, has Spain the right—has the world the right—to indicate to this Government how that war shall be prosecuted? When President Jackson was stating the conservative rules which governed him in dealing with the question of Texan independence, he contemplated continued relations of peace and amity with the Republic of Mexico.

When President Grant was laying down the rules which governed his Administration during the former revolution in Cuba, he contemplated that we would remain friends with Spain, and therefore should refrain from putting obstacles in the way of her success. But for causes sufficient to satisfy the Committee on Foreign Relations, for causes deemed sufficient by the President, Spain is now to be declared a public enemy, and we are met with the question, whether these international rules which apply in times of profound peace are to govern us now that war is about to be made.

Who has the right to say that we shall not fight Spain through the insurrectionary government now existing in the Island of Cuba? Who has the right to say we shall not acknowledge that government as a belligerent power and treat with it for the prosecution of the war? What canon of morality or of international law will be violated if in furtherance of the war we propose to wage against Spain we shall acknowledge, and thereby guarantee, the independence of the Cuban Republic?

To meet the very question that we have before us I introduced a series of resolutions yesterday, which I ask now to have read from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLEN in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

> A joint resolution (S. R. 144) to define the mode of proposed military operations in the Island of Cuba, and to secure the independence of the Cuban Republic.
> Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, First. That the contemplated military operations against the Spanish armies on the Island of Cuba should be carried on in concert with the military forces under the command of Gen. Maximo Gomez, such concert to be secured through arrangements between this Government and the Cuban revolutionary authorities recognized by said Gomez, and that any offer looking to such arrangements that may be made by those authorities should be favorably considered, provided it shall concede to the commanding officer of the United States troops the right to control and direct all military operations.
> Second. That all such military operations should be carried on to the end that the independence of the Cuban Republic may be secured.

Mr. LINDSAY. Now, Mr. President, when war has been declared against Spain, when the joint resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations shall have been adopted by the two Houses and signed by the President, where is the objection in an international point of view against forming relations with the Cuban Government and utilizing the troops it has under its control to the end that we may the more successfully carry on the war?

The resolutions reported this morning declare that certain ends shall be accomplished against the Kingdom of Spain through our Army and Navy, and yet upon some supersensitive objection to violating international law we are utterly silent as to whether we will avail ourselves of an advantage that naturally presents itself to us. We have 26,000 regular soldiers altogether.

The joint resolution does not provide that men may be enlisted to carry on a foreign war. It merely provides that the militia of the United States may be called out for the accomplishment of the purposes proposed. But there is a grave constitutional question as to whether militia called out as provided by the resolution can be sent from our shores to prosecute an aggressive war in a foreign country. The resolution contemplates that we shall commence the war with an army of 26,000 men with full knowledge of the fact that there are over 60,000 Spaniards in arms in the Island of Cuba. If we shall make any pretense to manning our coast defense with educated soldiers we can not spare more than one-half that 26,000 men to make up an army of invasion.

Mr. President, if the Spanish forces in Cuba were to surrender to us without firing a shot we have not men enough to send to Cuba to take them into custody and to preserve law and order while we are setting up the new and stable government for the people of Cuba.

I ask, where is the policy, where is the good sense, where lies the statesmanship in refusing to recognize the men who have carried on war for more than three years, in order that we may by our own unaided efforts accomplish this great good for the Cuban people?

The joint resolution contemplates immediate action. It does not propose that we shall wait six months or four months, but that the President, within a reasonable time after it becomes effective, shall proceed to expel the Spanish armies from the Island of Cuba. We will send to Cuba at the beginning of the sickly season unacclimated Americans—those now in the Army or those young men who, out of patriotic ardor, may volunteer for this coming war—we will send these young men down to meet disease and death rather than avail ourselves of a force amply able and ready and eager to take care of the Island of Cuba without an American soldier ever setting his foot upon it.

When France concluded to intervene in the struggle between Great Britain and her American colonies, France took no such course as that. France, without having directly recognized our belligerency, at the end of a three years' struggle on our part, acknowledged our independence by entering into a treaty with us based upon the idea that the French and American soldiers, side by side, should work out the salvation of the great cause then pending.

Shall we not imitate the example of France? Shall republican America show herself less generous than monarchic France showed herself one hundred and twenty years ago? Shall we say to the struggling patriots, "You are but a band of highwaymen, of outlaws, of disturbers of the public peace, and that this Government will not degrade itself and sully its honor by making you its allies, although you have sacrificed all the world holds precious, although you have maintained a most unequal and unfriended contest for three years in behalf of Cuban independence?" Shall we say to them they do not deserve now to be recognized by their American friends, and that they must dissolve their government and put themselves upon the footing of Spanish subjects overcome by American arms?

I do not pretend to say the resolution is expected to accomplish these ends, but I do say it makes no provision whereby anybody shall be under obligation to receive proposals from these people to join with us to fight our battles while they are fighting their own.

The resolution I have offered, if adopted (and it will be a fitting supplement to the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations), is to the effect that, war having been commenced, the military operations of our Government against the Spanish armies on the Island of Cuba shall be carried on in concert with the Cuban army under the command of Gomez, subject only to the condition, which France generously waived when she came to our assistance, that the commanding officer of the American troops shall control and direct all military operations.

Why not make these people our allies? There can be no objection unless we intend, through the process of intervention, to put them under military constraint while we usurp the function of setting up a government for the Island of Cuba.

There is another objection, well stated by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], but disputed flatly by Senators on the other side of the Chamber, and that is that as the conquerors of Cuba, as the disposers of Cuban independence, we encounter the danger of making ourselves responsible in the estimation of the world and under the rules of international law for the payment of Spanish debts for which the revenues of Cuba may be pledged.

When Texas was annexed and the revenues of that Republic turned into the Federal Treasury, British creditors, through the British Government, complained. Our answer was that under our treaty with Texas certain public lands had been set aside for the payment of the Texas indebtedness, and I suppose they afterwards paid it all, but the British Government promptly replied, "That was an arrangement which might bind us. It was an arrangement which might bind Texas, but that as we had taken the domain, as we had converted the revenues of Texas into our coffers, they would look to us for the payment of all their demands or claims;" and we would have paid them if the State of Texas had proved unable to do so.

Recognizing this rule and to protect the United States against claims like those under discussion Congress, out of the $10,000,000 agreed to be paid to Texas upon the adjustment of her boundaries, retained one-half that sum, "until the creditors of the State holding bonds and certificates of the stock for which duties on imports were speially pledged shall first file at the Treasury of the United States releases of all claims against the United States for or on account of said bonds or certificates."

When Chile, after the war with Bolivia, took possession of the guano beds against which American citizens had claims, this Government took the ground, and properly so, that whatever liens existed in favor of American citizens against those islands which Chile had taken by conquest were as good against the conqueror as they had been good against Bolivia.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Kentucky a question?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to know if the Senator knows of any person, in the Congress or out of it, representing any considerable American sentiment, who desires either to conquer Cuba or annex Cuba?

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, when we put the Spanish armies off the Island of Cuba with our Army and Navy and put the revolutionary forces under military restraint, we will have conquered the Island of Cuba.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator if he knows anybody who proposes to put the revolutionary forces in Cuba under our military constraint?

Mr. LINDSAY. The President, in his message sent here on the 11th, speaking of the intervention he proposes, says:

> It involves, however, hostile constraint upon both the parties to the contest, as well to enforce a truce as to guide the eventual settlement.

Mr. HOAR. On what page of the message is that found?

Mr. LINDSAY. It commences on the tenth page, with the last paragraph, and ends at the top of the eleventh page. It is against the doing of that particular thing I most earnestly protest, and I complain that the resolution reported this morning does not guard against it, but impliedly gives assent to the proposition.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I will not undertake to detain the Senate further than to say, with his leave, that I do not believe the President of the United States or any ten men out of our 70,000,000 of population understand that the constraint which is spoken of is expected to be carried to the degree of assuming the government or control of that island. We, as it seems to me, can no more be chargeable with the debts of Cuba or with the debts of Spain, secured upon Cuba, if they are secured, than a fireman who puts out a fire in a house is liable for a mortgage on the house or a policeman who stops a row in a house and turns out an intruder is liable for the debts of the owner.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, I do not think that an act of war upon the part of one great nation against another for the avowed purpose of dispossessing that nation of a valuable island like Cuba can be properly compared to a policeman who suppresses a disturbance in a citizen's house or a fireman who breaks the furniture in attempting to extinguish a fire.

I take the President's message for what it says. I argue that doing that which the President recommends shall be done, that which the committee's report proposes shall be done, will be the conquest of the Island of Cuba as against the Kingdom of Spain. When our ships knock down Morro Castle, when our troops land upon the Island of Cuba and force the surrender of the Spanish troops and send them to Spain as prisoners of war, when we say to Gomez and to his government that "for the accomplishment of the purposes we have in view, we put you under military constraint," I ask the Senator, I ask any man who looks at the question from a common-sense standpoint, whether we will not stand that day the conquerors of the Island of Cuba, there being no power on earth, foreign or domestic, to resist our will or to call it in question?

It may be that we intend to use our conquest for a beneficent purpose. It may be that in the estimation of the civilized world we can justify this assault upon the Kingdom of Spain by saying in advance that we intend to take the Island of Cuba from under the hand of the despoiler and give its people the right to govern themselves; that we intend to establish a stable government capable of maintaining order and performing its obligations and duties, all of which the world will no doubt commend. But we will be none the less the conqueror during the period between the time the Spaniards are expelled and the revolutionists put under military constraint, and the establishment of the government to which we propose finally to turn over the control of the island.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. CAFFERY. If, as the Senator says, we intervene with arms, drive out the Spaniards, and conquer the country from the Spaniards, and then establish a government of the people of the Island of Cuba, can we in any sense be said to have conquered Cuba?

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, you do not conquer land as land, nor do you conquer a people as individuals. You conquer a country by overthrowing the government of the country and establishing yourselves as the governing authority in that country; and when we shall overthrow Spanish domination, when we shall put the insurrectionary people under constraint, there will be no law in Cuba except the law we declare and administer, and that will be the law which comes from our will and not from the will of the people of Cuba.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky still further yield?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. CAFFERY. This question has reference to another I had in mind.

Mr. LINDSAY. Do not lay traps for me; if you have a question to ask, come out squarely and ask it.

Mr. CAFFERY. I am not digging any pitfalls for the Senator.

Mr. LINDSAY. I have known it to be done.

Mr. CAFFERY. I am asking for information. The Senator propounded the doctrine that in the event of the United States intervening in the affairs between Spain and the insurgents and setting up a government in that country such as the Senator says the United States contemplates—that is, a government of the people of Cuba—in that contingency the United States would be bound for the obligations that Spain had incurred by mortgage upon the Island of Cuba. Now, I should like to know whether the United States or the government which the United States would install would be liable, if anybody were liable?

Mr. LINDSAY. I will come to that question presently. The first thing I wish to do is to establish the proposition that when we shall have overthrown the Spanish Government, and when we shall have put the revolutionary government under military constraint, then we will be the governing authority on that island. There must be an appreciable length of time between the overthrow of one government and the putting the other under constraint, and the setting up of the new government to be eventually controlled by the people of Cuba.

During that interval suppose something arises that gives Great Britain a claim against the authority in control of Cuba. Would it lie in our mouths to say, when Great Britain should make a demand, that we were not there in our own right, that we were there as benefactors of the human race, overthrowing a tyrannical government for the purpose of establishing human liberty and stable government, and therefore we can not be made to answer? Such a reply would not be made, and such a reply, if made, would subject us to ridicule throughout the civilized world.

If it be true, as to the period between the time we shall establish our Government to the exclusion of everybody else and the time when we shall surrender authority to the new government, we will hold the Island of Cuba as a conqueror, then we will bring ourselves under all the obligations a conqueror ever brings himself under.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator one other question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator hold that the Government of the United States when it put down the civil war in this country and for a time took charge of the government of every Southern State became responsible for the State debts to foreign creditors?

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, that brings up a question about which there might be a very wide difference of opinion expressed.

Mr. HOAR. I think so.

Mr. LINDSAY. And that is, whether the Southern States were held as foreign territory, and reduced to subjection by the United States as conquered provinces.

Mr. HOAR. But if they were held as domestic territory reduced to subjection, the United States taking possession of their governments for the time being, and dispossessing the State governments, would they not a fortiori be liable?

Mr. LINDSAY. The United States claimed, whether properly or not, that in all it did in the way of suppressing the insurrectionary States and reconstructing their governments it acted under authority conferred by the Federal Constitution, of the existence of which every creditor of those States had notice at the time his contracts were entered into.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. The United States never recognized the right of any of the Confederate States to deal with foreign nations.

Mr. LINDSAY. Of course not.

Mr. DANIEL. They were not recognized as independent governments.

Mr. STEWART. But disputed it all the while, and we never have denied the right of Spain to contract as she pleases. We never acknowledged the right of the Confederate States to make contracts that would bind that section of the country in their political capacity, or to contract a national debt; but we have never denied the right of Spain to do that very thing.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, the United States never admitted the right of any State in the Union, as a member of the Confederacy, to exercise any power contrary to the limitations of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did not the United States constantly insist that no State could constitutionally secede from the Union?

Mr. LINDSAY. Oh, yes; and prosecuted a war for four years to demonstrate that its interpretation of the Federal Constitution was right, and the arbitrament of arms proved it, so far as any question in dispute can be proved by superior force.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to make one observation there?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. What was said by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] is all true, but it does not touch this proposition. The Senator's proposition is that if a government have made a lawful contract with individuals abroad, like that which the Government of Spain is said to have made with individual creditors belonging to various European countries, and we overthrow and take possession of that Government, even for a time, for the purpose of pacification, not intending to hold it permanently, we become liable to its obligations.

If that proposition be true—and the question is whether it is true—then it is true that the United States Government overthrew certain State governments for a time—not permanently, but for a time—and assumed to exercise the powers of government itself, those State governments having made lawful contracts with foreign creditors, as they had a right to do.

If the Senator's proposition be true, it seems to me, with great deference to him, that it is true that we became liable for those State debts. It does not distinguish the case I put from the case he is arguing to say that in certain other particulars there was a great difference between denying the right of the States to secede and saying that the State governments could not make contracts with foreign governments by treaty or otherwise, but that that must be done by the United States. That is my proposition.

Mr. LINDSAY. I think I will meet that proposition. It does not lie in my mouth nor in the mouth of my friend who sits beside me [Mr. DANIEL] to say that the Constitution, as interpreted by all the Departments of the United States, is not the true law of the Union, because when we accepted our parole as prisoners of war, we agreed that we would go home and live as law-abiding citizens, and we agreed that the United States should determine what the law was. The Federal Government never did admit that any State government had taken its State out of the Union. It never did claim that it overturned any constitutional or legal State government.

The claim of the United States from the outset was that the officers of the various States abdicated their functions under the Constitution of the United States and became heads of the members of a rebellious conspiracy, seeking to set aside and to overturn lawful Federal authority; and when the Federal arms prevailed and the revolutionary governments were dissolved, the Federal Government took possession upon the idea that there were no existing State governments, and therefore it was incumbent upon Congress and the Executive to reconstruct the governments of those States, so that they might resume their places in the Federal Union and exercise their functions as legal State governments.

These principles can not be applied to the Spanish debt. Spain was the monarch, Spain's authority was supreme, Spain had the right to issue its obligations and to put them into the hands of the men who would buy them, and Spain had the right to pledge the revenues of Cuba to the payment of those claims.

My contention is that whoever conquers Spain and takes Cuba away from Spain takes the title from Spain, and, in the estimation of international law, must perform the obligations in relation to Cuba which Spain has undertaken to perform. It is said that this is a doubtful proposition, and I do not claim that it is closed against all question.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator answer this question: Whether the obligations of Spain in the case supposed by him would be transferred from Spain to the United States, to the country conquering a province or a part of the dominions of Spain? Spain has issued certain bonds. They are called the Cuban-Spanish bonds. Spain is the obligor of those bonds; she is the party primarily and solely responsible; she secures the payment of those bonds by a pledge, I am told, of a part or the whole of the customs duties arising from the Island of Cuba.

Now, I propound this question: Whether, in the event of liability either upon the part of the United States or on the part of the government in the Island of Cuba which will succeed the Spanish Government, there would be any other than the mortgage liability, than the hypothecated liability, than the liability springing from the obligation to devote so much of those customs to the payment of the bonds?

Mr. SPOONER. There could not be a mortgage liability.

Mr. LINDSAY. The obligations of Spain are direct, and the revenues collected in Cuba are specifically pledged. Then we take the corpus and we hold it as conquerors. Certainly to the extent we convert those revenues we become answerable to creditors, but there is no principle under which we can escape liability by voluntarily and without consideration setting up a successor to take the country we have conquered without regard to the ability or disposition of that successor to pay.

I do not argue that this proposition is clear beyond cavil; I do not contend that the opposite doctrine has not been held; but I do say that the United States Government is the last Government which in conscience or morality can dispute the proposition.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. Do I understand the Senator to insist that if the independence of the so-called Cuban Republic should be recognized and the Spanish arms should be expelled from Cuba under the auspices of the Cuban Republic, thereupon the Cuban Republic would become responsible for Spanish bonds to the extent that the revenues had been pledged for their payment?

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, I do not think for the purposes of my argument I need to answer that question. I will say this, however, that as those bonds were issued for the purpose of raising money to keep the Cuban people in subjection to Spain, there would be no moral obligation upon the Cuban Republic to make provision for the payment of those bonds.

Mr. CARTER. How, then, would a moral or legal responsibility attach to the United States for driving the oppressor from Cuban soil?

Mr. LINDSAY. We are not about to make war on that ground alone. If you will read the message of the President and if you will read the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, you will find that we have set up separate and distinct grounds for war against Spain, wholly independent of her treatment of the people of Cuba. We do not claim that we shall go to war actuated merely by humanitarian views.

We put all the stress upon humanitarian considerations we can, and thus fortify our position in the estimation of the civilized world; but we speak about our own trade; we speak about our own commerce; we speak about the destruction of the property of our own citizens; we speak about the blowing up of one of our battle ships under circumstances of the most suspicious character, and for which Spain has made neither reparation nor sufficient apology.

I say when you read the grounds of intervention set up by the President, all except the one ground of humanity, which has been practically taken from under our feet by the offer of Spain to feed and to permit us to feed the starving Cubans, that every ground for intervention is a ground which we could justly make a cause of war without intervening in behalf of Cuba at all.

Our proposition is not wholly unselfish; our proposition is not wholly humanitarian; our proposition is to get indemnity for the past and security for the future. The freeing of the Island of Cuba is but an incident to our war, and it comes not because we love Cuba, but because we can not protect our material interests unless we shall set up in Cuba a stable government capable of maintaining order and performing its obligations to private citizens and its international obligations to other States. When we take possession of Cuba, expel the Spaniards, and put the insurgents under military constraint, we will hold the island as conquerors.

Let us see what the American rule in a case like that is. I do not care to go to an author who writes upon international law in the abstract. I propose to turn to a letter written by a most distinguished statesman from New England, a man who stood preeminent as a constitutional and international lawyer, a man whose fame will last as long as this Government lasts. Acting as our representative, as our Secretary of State, Mr. John Quincy Adams said in an official letter to Mr. Everett, another distinguished citizen of Massachusetts and of New England:

No principle of international law can be more clearly established than this, that the rights and the obligations of a nation in regard to other States are independent of its internal revolutions of government.

That is the first proposition.

It extends even to the case of conquest. The conqueror who reduces a nation to his subjection receives it subject to all its engagements—

Not merely to the liens; not merely to the collaterals pledged, but—receives it subject to all its engagements and duties toward others, the fulfillment of which then becomes his own duty.

That is not alone where you acquire sovereignty by purchase; not alone where you acquire sovereignty by treaty; not alone where you acquire sovereignty by the joint action of two governments which consolidate themselves into one; but this rule—this honest, this equitable rule—extends to a case of conquest, and the conqueror who substitutes his authority for that of the conquered, who takes all the benefits of the conquest; who takes all the rights of the conquered, also incurs all the obligations and duties of the conquered, and in the estimation of morality, as well as under the American interpretation of international law, those obligations he must perform.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. CAFFERY. Suppose the Cuban insurgents conquer and drive out the Spaniards from Cuba, are the Spanish obligations resting upon Cuba valid and obligatory against the conquering Cubans?

Mr. LINDSAY. That is a question in which, under present circumstances, we have not the slightest interest. If the Cubans conquer their own independence, drive the Spaniards out of Cuba, and set up Cuban authority in the place of Spanish authority, what interest have we got in the manner in which they may settle with Spanish bondholders?

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LINDSAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARTER. Would the Senator from Kentucky shirk a liability by falling in behind the Gomez government for the purpose of avoiding the legitimate consequences of war?

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, I have not that high order of philanthropy, that delicate sensibility, which seems to afflict my friend. If we wish to make war against Spain, and make a successful war, and we find a government engaged in the business of conquering Cuba, why should we set that government aside in order that we may step in and make ourselves responsible for the Spanish indebtedness chargeable to that island?

Mr. President, Mr. Adams said in this connection not that this obligation was always recognized, not that these duties were always performed, but that—

However frequent the instances of departure from this principle may be in point of fact, it can not, with any color of reason, be contested on the ground of right.

However often the principle may be disregarded, however frequently the conqueror may refuse to carry out the obligations imposed upon him by equitable considerations and by the rules of international law, still the obligation exists, and we will not be able to escape the performance of those duties by pleading the example of some other nation which refused to perform them.

Mr. GRAY. From what authority was the Senator reading just now?

Mr. LINDSAY. I was reading from a letter written by John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State, in 1818, to Mr. Everett, then having under discussion the question that now arises, because the revolutions in South America were then in full progress. I do not say that that letter is conclusive, but I do say that when the Frenchmen, and the Germans, and the Englishmen, and the Americans come and set up their claims against us they will come, not under the mere dicta of an international-law writer, but will come confirmed by an official document, written by a representative of our own Government under similar circumstances and conditions to those with which we will have to deal when we drive the Spaniards out of Cuba and put the revolutionary forces under military constraint.

There is another view of this case. Why should we be so sensitive about acknowledging the belligerency of the Cuban Republic and treating with it as a belligerent power, looking to the ultimate independence of Cuba, and providing in the treaty arranging for our concerted action what the duties of that republic shall be after it becomes in fact the dominant power in the Island of Cuba? Both Houses of Congress declared two years ago that this republic was entitled to be treated as a belligerent power. The Senate made the same declaration one year ago. Why shall we refuse to assert that fact to-day?

It is said, and not without force; it is claimed, and I am affected by the claim, that by reason of the bitter feelings engendered by the long contest between the Cuban and Spanish authorities that when the Cubans come to govern the island Spanish life will not be safe and Spanish property will be ruthlessly confiscated. I can understand this fear when I look at the history of my own country.

I can not shut my eyes to the fact that after our independence had been achieved we treated the loyalists with singular rigor, driving many of them out of our country. I can understand how the Cubans will be controlled by similar feelings, and therefore, instead of putting their organized forces under military constraint, I think it our duty to make an arrangement with them while they are willing to treat, providing that when their independence shall have been secured through our assistance no man shall be unjustly dealt with and no man's property unjustly confiscated.

I desire to take this great question up now when we can deal with it successfully and without difficulty, and not only insure independence to Cuba, but secure protection to those people who have adhered to the Spanish Crown and who may choose to keep their homes in the Island of Cuba. All this it is now in our power to do; but if this resolution be adopted without amendment, if those people be kept at arm's length, then we take the chance of being compelled to put the government which we shall set up under constraint to prevent it from disregarding our ideas of justice and propriety in regard to a large and wealthy portion of the people of Cuba.

I am not altogether satisfied with the grounds upon which we propose to base our intervention; but they are sufficient for war, and at the end of a successful war we may dictate the terms of peace, and in doing so accomplish all the ends of a justifiable intervention.

Whatever may be ultimately developed in regard to the destruction of the battle ship Maine, and whatever may be the liability of the Spanish Government to answer for that most appalling calamity, it is not my intention to consider that question as bearing upon the argument I propose to submit in support of the proposition that we have the right, under the rules of international law, and that it is a duty we owe to ourselves and to humanity, to intervene, by force, if necessary, to terminate Spanish control in the Island of Cuba and to afford to the people of that country the opportunity for self-government.

I do not claim that this country would be justified in undertaking a moral or political supervision over the affairs of its neighbors, or in correcting, by armed intervention or otherwise, the faults of their institutions or the mistakes or abuses of their administration. I freely concede that, generally speaking, a nation can justify itself in forcible interference in the affairs of another country only for the necessary self-defense of its material interest or for the protection of its national honor, which has been said to be its highest interest.

To intervene by force after all propositions for friendly mediation have been refused may or may not be an offense against international morality. Conditions and circumstances must determine the moral quality of such action, and no unqualified statement of a general rule of international law can be accepted as conclusive of such a question one way or the other.

Considerations of humanity rarely justify intervention, but international law does recognize the existence of such a right, when, to prevent unjustifiable slaughter and outrage, it has become absolutely necessary to intervene, and this even in cases of armed rebellion against a government by its own citizens or subjects.

The great powers of Europe have asserted and exercised the right of intervention to protect the subjects of the Sultan of Turkey from what they deemed unjustifiable slaughter and outrage.

The United States bear the same or at least as dominant a relation to American countries as the great powers of Europe bear to the European and Asiatic dominions of the Sultan.

Independent of the general power and duty of the United States to intervene in cases of extremity in behalf of American rights and interests, the geographical situation has been deemed a sufficient reason why that power and duty applies with exceptional force to the Island of Cuba.

We have always claimed the right to control the destiny of that island in the event Spain should lose the power to govern it.

Its commanding position with reference to the Gulf of Mexico and the West India seas; the character of its population; its situation midway between our southern coasts and the Island of Domingo; its safe and capacious harbor at Havana, fronting a long line of our shores destitute of the same advantage; the nature of its productions and of its wants, furnishing the supplies and needing the returns of a commerce immensely profitable and mutually beneficial, give it an importance in the sum of our national interests with which that of no other foreign territory can be compared and little inferior to that which binds the different members of the Union together.

This was the language of John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State in 1823, who, for the reasons thus lucidly stated, and in the same connection, laid it down as a proposition of which the world must take notice that while the United States were willing that the connection between Cuba and Spain should continue as it then existed, the transfer of that island to any other European power would not be tolerated, and that its transfer to Great Britain would probably be resisted by force.

In 1825, Mr. Adams then being the President, through his Secretary of State, Mr. Clay, instructed our ministers to the leading European governments to announce "that the United States, for themselves, desired no change in the political condition of Cuba. That they were satisfied that it should remain open, as it now is, to their commerce, and that they could not with indifference see it passing from Spain to any (other) European power" in any contingency whatever.

In 1840 Mr. Forsythe, our Secretary of State, authorized our minister at Madrid to—Assure the Spanish Government that in case of any attempt, from whatever quarter, to wrest from her this portion of her territory, she might surely depend upon the military and naval resources of the United States to aid her in preserving or recovering it.

Mr. Webster, Secretary of State, in a communication to Mr. Campbell of date January 14, 1843, said that—

The Spanish Government has long been in possession of the policy and wishes of this Government in regard to Cuba, which have never changed, and has repeatedly been told that the United States never would permit the occupation of that island by British agents or forces upon any pretext whatever, and that in the event of any attempt to wrest it from her she might securely rely upon the whole naval and military resources of this country to aid her in preserving or recovering it.

In October, 1851, Mr. Webster, in a letter to President Fillmore, summed up the situation thus:

In General Jackson's time it was intimated to Spain by our Government that if she would not cede Cuba to any European power, we would assist her in maintaining possession of it. A lively fear existed at that time that England had designs upon the island. The same intimation was given to Spain, through Mr. Irving, when I was formerly in the State Department.

This Government has not only asserted the right to prevent the transfer of the island to any European power and its intention to protect the Spanish possession against attempts to wrest it from her, but has uniformly refused to join in or recognize the validity of proposed agreements between European powers to guarantee Spain's title and possession.

In 1852 Mr. Everett, Secretary of State, in addressing Mr. Crampton concerning a proposed compact of this nature, felt constrained to say:

The Island of Cuba lies at our doors. It commands the approach to the Gulf of Mexico, which washes the shores of five of our States. It bars the entrance to that great river which drains half the American continent and, with its tributaries, forms the largest system of internal water connection in the world. It keeps watch at the doorway of our intercourse with California by the Isthmus route. If an island like Cuba belonging to the Spanish Crown guarded the entrance to the Thames or the Seine and the United States should propose a convention like this to France and England, these powers would assuredly feel that the disability assumed by ourselves was far less serious than that which we asked them to assume.

A few days afterwards, when again writing to Mr. Crampton, Mr. Everett said:

To enter into a compact with European powers to the effect that the United States, as well as other contracting powers, would disclaim an intention, now or hereafter, to obtain possession of Cuba, would be inconsistent with the principles and policy and traditions of the United States.

During the Cuban insurrection which began in 1868 Mr. Fish, in a communication to our minister, Mr. Cushing, declared that—

Civil dissensions in Cuba, and especially sanguinary hostilities such as are now raging there, produce effects in the United States second only to those which they produce in Spain.

For three-fourths of a century this Government has persistently asserted its right to control the ultimate destiny of Cuba. Its denial of the right of European intervention for the protection of Spain, even with the consent of that nation, has been acquiesced in by the leading European governments since 1852. The Spanish Crown has never intimated that it considered our offers to guarantee Spanish domination in Cuba against any other European power as either officious or unwarranted.

The fundamental principle upon which the United States may take an active interest in Cuban affairs, even to the extent of armed intervention in extreme cases like the present, has been established by the concurrence of Spain and all the leading commercial powers of Europe in the well-grounded, deliberate, and open assertion of that right by our Government.

Having assumed and maintained the right to decide that the Cuban people, so long as they remain the subjects of a Europern power, shall be governed by Spain, and that they shall not secure free institutions and liberal government at the hands of Great Britain, France, Germany, Holland, or any other progressive country, it would be a crime against humanity and a breach of faith for this country now to take the ground so strenuously insisted upon in some quarters, that we can not intervene by force to protect these people against the horrors of a cruel and hopeless struggle by Spain to maintain an ascendency, the right to which she has forfeited by persistent misgovernment, because to do so would be undertaking a moral or political supervision over the affairs of a neighboring state for the correction of the faults of its institutions or of the mistakes of its administration.

The time has come when we can not with honor say to the world that Cuba shall continue a Spanish province until, by her own unaided exertions, she can drive the Spanish soldiers off the island and expel the Spanish ships from its ports, no matter what the consequences to the Cuban people may be.

Over three years of sanguinary war have demonstrated the inability of Spain to suppress the insurrection. The fixed determination of the Cuban people to win their independence at any sacrifice, even to the extremity of practical extermination, the events of current history abundantly establish.

The case, therefore, is one in which forcible intervention would be justified by the obligations arising out of common humanity for the prevention of unjustifiable slaughter and outrage.

With our Government it is a case demanding intervention, not only upon humane considerations and for the defense of her material interests, but in view of our ultimate authority over Cuba, long ago assumed and always strenuously insisted upon, we are bound to intervene for the preservation of our good faith and national honor.

To denominate the Cuban revolutionists guerrillas and bandits engaged in the commission of crimes not recognized as war in any civilized country, and to say that the Cuban army is made up of Cubans, negroes, renegades, and adventurers of all sorts, is to give the lie to that which all fair-minded and well-informed men know to be true, and the claim has been more than sufficiently answered by the report this day made by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], speaking partly from personal observation and partly from information received from most trustworthy sources, has told us that in Cuba—

The dividing lines between parties are the most straight and clear-cut that have ever come to his knowledge. The division in our war was by no means so clearly defined. It is Cuban against Spaniard. It is the entire Cuban population on the one side, and the Spanish army and citizens on the other.

At the beginning of the present revolution the Cubans constituted seven-eighths of the entire population, and the race division with the natives was, approximately, 1,000,000 whites and 400,000 negroes. The courageous resistance, the extraordinary sacrifices, the unparalleled suffering these people have made and endured and continue to make and endure, prove them to be worthy of the name of Americans and capable of giving to the land of their nativity better government than it has ever received or ever can receive at the hands of Spain.

The independence of Cuba has been looked to with expectancy and favor by American statesmen for many years. Independence has been regarded as the manifest exigency of the political interests of the Cuban people and all other Americans. It has been said that—

If there be one lesson in history more cogent in its teachings than any other, it is that no part of America large enough to establish a self-sustaining state can be permanently held in forced subjection to Europe. Complete separation between the metropolis and the colony may be postponed by the former conceding to the latter a greater or less degree of local autonomy nearly approaching to independence.

But in all cases where positive antagonism has come to exist between the mother country and its colonial subjects, where the sense of oppression is strongly felt by the latter, and especially where relentless warfare has alienated the parties one from the other more completely than they are sundered by the ocean itself, their political separation is inevitable. It is one of those conclusions which have been aptly called the inexorable logic of events.

These words, penned by Mr. Fish in 1874, apply with peculiar force to the condition of affairs in Cuba in 1898. Every prerequisite to the inevitable conclusion that there must be a complete separation between the European metropolis and the American colony confessedly exists, and the duty of the United States, as the sovereign power on this side of the Atlantic, to interpose its fiat as the law of the occasion in favor of Cuban independence, is as clear to the minds of the peace-loving American people as the duty to manifest our sympathy for countries contending for popular institutions, and to extend aid to any American colony struggling to free itself from European oppression whenever it may be legitimately extended.

The policy of Mr. Cleveland's Administration, announced in his message in December, 1896, that—when the inability of Spain to deal with the insurrection has become manifest and it is demonstrated that her sovereignty is extinct in Cuba for all purposes of rightful existence, and when a hopeless struggle for its reestablishment has degenerated into a strife which means nothing more than the useless sacrifice of human life and the utter destruction of the very subject of the conflict, the situation will be presented in which our obligations to the sovereignty of Spain will be superseded by higher obligations which we can hardly hesitate to recognize and discharge—met with universal approval at home and general commendation abroad.

The inability of Spain to suppress the revolution has passed beyond the region of doubt. Her sovereignty is extinct for all the purposes of its rightful existence, and the struggle has long since degenerated into a strife which means only the criminal sacrifice of life and the useless destruction of property.

Intervention, under such circumstances, to secure from Spain the recognition of an accomplished fact, will not necessarily mean war, and will afford no just cause to Spain for the manifestation of such resentment as may lead to war.

Why shall not Spain recognize an accomplished fact? Why shall the abandonment of the attempt to regain her lost property be deemed such an act of humiliation upon her part that she can not submit to it? Great Britain sacrificed neither dignity nor honor in treating with the American States upon the basis of independence when she became convinced that military success was more than doubtful, and that even if present disaster could be converted into ultimate victory, those relations of trust and confidence between the British Crown and the American people, without which good government was impossible, could under no circumstances be reestablished.

Spain has time and again bowed to the inevitable, as one after another of her American dependencies succeeded, by force, in establishing the right to a separate national existence. It is a false pride that stands in the way of peace when war has become hopeless and the sacrifice of human life has degenerated into organized murder.

If intervention shall result in war it will be because Spain prefers war with the United States to the voluntary relinquishment of the impossible attempt to reestablish her lost authority in the Island of Cuba, and this will be the verdict of the civilized world.

It is possibly all the better that Spain may compel the American Government to resort to force in the discharge of the imperative duty it owes to humanity, to free institutions, and to its own interest and dignity. Perhaps there could not be a juster cause nor a more appropriate occasion than the present for this Government to make good, in the most emphatic way, the claim asserted by the last Administration, and indorsed by Congress and by the American people, that "the United States is practically sovereign on this continent, and its fiat is law upon the subjects to which it confines its interposition."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being Senate bill 2680.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. President——

Mr. PETTUS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside in order to enable the Senator from Washington to address the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand that the joint resolution reported by the Senator from Minnesota from the Committee on Foreign Relations having been objected to by the Senator from Massachusetts, it will necessarily go over until to-morrow. I take it for granted that the Senator from Minnesota will then bring it before the Senate, and I desire to state that after it is before the Senate I shall object to the consideration of any business except the joint resolution, and if any other business is transacted it will have to be done by a majority vote of the Senate to give that business the preference over the joint resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. GORMAN. I understand it will be entirely convenient to the Senator from Washington to go on to-morrow.

Mr. TURNER. I was about to state that if I could have the floor so as to proceed in the morning I would prefer it.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Washington will have the floor.

Mr. TURNER. Very well; then I shall not proceed now.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the Senator from Maryland will not make a motion to adjourn at this time. There is an hour and a half between now and 6 o'clock and the Senator from Washington is ready to go on.

Mr. CULLOM. No; he says not.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Washington states that he prefers to go on to-morrow morning.

Mr. CHANDLER. He did, naturally, after the Senator from Maryland invited him to say it, but the Senator was on the floor ready to proceed, and it does seem to me that in an emergency of this kind, when certainly important business is before the Senate, to adjourn at half past 4 o'clock is not proper. I do not wish to use any stronger language than that, because the Senator from Maryland always has a good reason for what he does, but I appeal to him not to make a motion to adjourn at this time, but to let us go on with the public business.

Mr. GORMAN. If the Senate has any public business to transact, so that the Senator from Washington can have the floor to-morrow morning, I have not the slightest objection to going on. If the Senator from New Hampshire desires to bring any motion before the body or to make a speech himself, I shall be delighted to remain here several hours.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Maryland will allow me, he is on a very important committee, the Appropriations Committee, and it has two or three bills before this body. It has before the Senate now the sundry civil appropriation bill and the naval appropriation bill, and there is no reason why we should not spend an hour and a half at this time, if the Senator from Washington is not willing to go on and discuss the Cuban question and no other Senator wishes to discuss it, in considering one of the appropriation bills.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Iowa, left the Chamber, supposing this discussion would go on until the usual time for adjournment, and he is not now here.

Mr. TURNER. While I should prefer to go on to-morrow morning, I am entirely willing to yield to the wish of the Senate, and I am prepared now to make such remarks as I desire to submit, although I do not wish to constrain any Senators to remain on my account.

Mr. GORMAN. If the Senator from Washington desires to go on to-night, I shall not move to adjourn, but if he prefers to proceed to-morrow morning, and there is no other matter to be brought before the Senate, I shall move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. TURNER. I prefer to go on in the morning.

Mr. CHANDLER. As the joint resolution of the committee has been objected to and goes over until to-morrow, I shall not interpose in the desire for delay which is expressed by the Senator from Maryland, but I do give notice that to-morrow I shall object to all other business except the main question before the Senate.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I appeal to the Senator from Maryland not to move to adjourn, but to permit us to remain here one hour for the consideration of unobjected pension cases on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not an hour.

Mr. GORMAN. I have not the slightest objection to that course if the Senator from Washington will retain the floor for to-morrow morning.

Mr. GALLINGER. I make that request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none.

C. B. BRYAN & CO.

Mr. PASCO. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1246) for the relief of C. B. Bryan & Co., instruct me to report it favorably. I wish to state that a similar bill has already passed the Senate and gone to the House, and the House passed a bill of its own. Bills for this purpose have been through the committee a number of times, and I ask that the House bill may now be put upon its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to C. B. Bryan & Co., of Memphis, Tenn., $3,643.60 for the value of a coal barge and 16,968 bushels of Pittsburg coal, as found by the Court of Claims.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

YAZOO RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. MONEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8875) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Yazoo River at or near the city of Greenwood, Leflore County, in the State of Mississippi."

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, in line 7, after the word "that," to strike out the word "if;" in line 9, after the word "date," to strike out "hereof" and insert "of the approval of this act;" in line 10, after the word "and," to strike out "if the same;" in line 11, after the word "after," to strike out "the" and insert "said;" in the same line, after the word "date," to strike out "hereof" and the comma and insert "and;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Yazoo River at or near the city of Greenwood, in Leflore County, in the State of Mississippi," approved March 3, 1897, be, and the same is, so amended that the actual construction of the bridge therein authorized to be constructed shall be commenced within one year after the date of the approval of this act, and shall be completed within three years after said date; and the provisions of the act hereby amended shall remain in full force and effect, to all intents and purposes, just as though the construction of said bridge had been commenced and the same had been completed within the dates prescribed in said act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

AFFAIRS IN CUBA.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to inquire whether the unanimous consent was granted to consider pension bills. If it was not granted, I want to renew it at the proper time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAY in the chair). The Chair will state to the Senator from New Hampshire that the request was granted.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE].

Mr. FRYE. I present a resolution. It was supported by some members of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations on the ground that it was as efficient as the resolution finally reported by the committee, and that it was in harmony and responsive to the message of the President of the United States; and those members of the committee believed that that harmony was of grave importance. I present the resolution in order that the Senate may have an opportunity to determine whether or not it ought to be substituted for the resolution which was finally reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. GORMAN. Let it be read.

The resolution submitted by Mr. FRYE is as follows:

Whereas the abhorrent conditions which have existed for more than three years in the Island of Cuba, so near our own borders, have shocked the moral sense of the people of the United States, have been a disgrace to Christian civilization, culminating, as they have, in the destruction of a United States battle ship, with 266 of its officers and crew, while on a friendly visit in the harbor of Havana, and can not longer be endured, as has been set forth by the President of the United States in his message to Congress of April 11, 1898, upon which the action of Congress was invited: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby directed and empowered to take at once effective steps to bring about the immediate termination of hostilities in the Island of Cuba, to secure a stable and independent government for and by the people thereof; and the President is hereby directed and empowered to use the land and naval forces of the United States, and to call into active service the militia of the several States, for the purpose of carrying this resolution into effect.

Mr. BATE. With the permission of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], I ask to call up House bill 7943, about which there is no contest.

Mr. CHANDLER. Before the Senator from Tennessee proceeds, I should like to ask the status of the resolution which the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has reported. Is it a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations or is it a part of a speech or remarks of the Senator from Maine?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Maine to offer a resolution which was approved by certain members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and he desired to have it presented to the Senate that it might be printed and lie on the table for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then the Chair understood the Senator to present it himself as an individual Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On behalf of himself and certain members of the Committee on Foreign Relations. He so stated.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Chair will allow me. Certain members of the Committee on Foreign Relations can not join any one Senator in presenting resolutions. If it is a report—a supplementary report—from the committee, I understand what that is. If it is the action of the Senator from Maine alone, I understand what that is. But I do not understand that the resolution has any parliamentary status here unless it is offered by the Senator from Maine himself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, in replying to the question of the Senator from New Hampshire, merely stated the language of the Senator from Maine as he recollected it, and the fact that the resolution was reported by him and asked to be printed, and that it might lie on the table for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Chair understand it to be a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Maine to report the resolution for himself and as being approved by certain other members of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FRYE entered the Chamber.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Maine is now in the Chamber. I will state that my inquiry as to the resolution was whether it was offered by the Senator from Maine himself, to go upon the table, or whether it is in any sense a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FRYE. It is not a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations. The committee were unanimous in the report which was made to the Senate, but the resolution received the support of three or four members of that committee, and at the request of some of them, and on my own motion, too, it was presented in order that the Senate may have an opportunity to vote on it as a substitute, if they please, for the resolution reported.

Mr. CHANDLER. And the resolution is presented by the Senator as an individual Senator, as I understand it. I thank the Chair for giving me an opportunity to ascertain the exact status of the resolution.

Mr. BACON. May I inquire of the Senator from Maine how many of the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations were considered as favoring the joint resolution which has been submitted as the report of the committee?

Mr. FRYE. As at present advised I think the Senator from Maine will not reply.

Mr. BACON. I will state the reason why I ask the question, and I trust I may not be considered as out of order. I am sorry that my inquiry should have met with such a response from the Senator from Maine.

Certain resolutions were reported here as the action of the committee. The committee consists of eleven members. Then a portion of the committee, consisting of four members, signed a minority report, in which they advocated other resolutions. In other words, they did not agree to the joint resolution alone. Now I understand from the colloquy which has been had that there are still other members of that committee who do not give their unqualified support to the joint resolution, and therefore I think when a set of resolutions is reported to the Senate as the action of the committee, we have a right to know whether it is the action of the majority of the committee in presenting those particular resolutions.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is that a report or not?

Mr. FRYE. It is a simple resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Maine states that he reports it individually. Individually he presents the resolution and it goes upon the Calendar, and there is no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then it is not a majority report.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is not a report at all.

Mr. FRYE. It is not a report at all. It is a simple resolution which was before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and which received the support of certain members of that committee, believing that it was just as effectual as the one which was finally reported; that it was responsive to the message of the President, and that harmony between the Chief Executive and Congress was of very great value on an occasion like the one before us.

It was rejected by the committee, and the recognition of the independence of the present Cuban party was rejected by the committee. Then certain members of the committee reserved the right to make a minority report on that particular subject, and when that was done I reserved the right also to bring before the Senate the proposition which is presented by this resolution. But, as I understand it, the report of the committee on the joint resolution as it was presented to the Senate to-day was a unanimous report.

Mr. MORGAN. Every member of the committee voted for it.

Mr. FRYE. Every member, I think, voted for it. At the same time, I suppose, under the reserves made, any member of the committee might vote for the resolution which I have laid before the Senate to-day. But so far as I am concerned, if that was rejected by the Senate, I should certainly support the report of the committee and the resolution which is before the Senate from the committee.

Mr. BACON. Then I understand that the Senator has now very kindly answered the question which he very promptly, to use the mildest phrase, declined to answer when I asked it.

Mr. FRYE. I did not mean to be brusque to the Senator from Georgia; not a bit.

Mr. TELLER. I want to make an inquiry.

Mr. CHANDLER. One inquiry more of the Senator from Maine. We are to understand, then, that this resolution represents his proposition for dealing with the pending subject?

Mr. MORGAN. That is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. I want to understand it.

Mr. FRYE. I decline to answer that question.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very good. Now, we have the Senator from Maine presenting a resolution supported by certain members of the committee—he declines to say whom—and when asked whether he supports it himself, he declines to say whether he does so or not.

Mr. FRYE. As he has an undoubted right to do.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly. He has a perfect right to do it. I am not questioning that. The only criticism to be made of the Senator from Maine is that he has not been quite willing good-naturedly to tell us what he was about; that is all.

Mr. TELLER. I want to ask the Senator from Maine a question. I understood him to say that the resolution reported by the committee (which we would call a majority report, I suppose, because a minority report came in) received the support of all the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MORGAN. Of every one.

Mr. FRYE. Yes; I think so.

Mr. TELLER. All voted for it?

Mr. MORGAN. Every one.

Mr. TELLER. How does it happen, then, that we have a minority report?

Mr. MORGAN. It is not a minority report, it is a supplementary report presenting a new matter which Senators who signed the report desired to incorporate with it. The committee were not willing to do that. Those Senators did not antagonize anything in the report, but wanted to add something to it.

Mr. TELLER. They simply thought the report did not go far enough?

Mr. MORGAN. That is all.

Mr. TELLER. That seems to me to be a very irregular way of making a report.

Mr. BACON. Now, if I am not out of order, as the question is fairly before the Senate, what I desire to know is this, and if it is not a proper question I will certainly withdraw it at the suggestion of the Senator from Maine. It seems that there has been a unanimous agreement on the part of the Committee on Foreign Relations to the resolutions which were reported, but that a certain number of that committee desire still other resolutions in connection therewith.

Mr. MORGAN. An amendment of the joint resolution.

Mr. BACON. What I desire to know is this, if it is proper that I should make the inquiry: What number of the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations were content with the resolutions as they have been reported and did not desire that there should be any change in the same by addition or otherwise?

Mr. MORGAN. All but four.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Maine himself has introduced one.

Mr. MORGAN. You ask what number were satisfied. They all concurred.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Maine does not seem to be satisfied.

Mr. MORGAN. Every member of that committee voted for the joint resolution reported this morning.

Mr. BACON. I understand that, and I endeavored to so state my understanding.

Mr. MORGAN. There were four gentlemen who expressed in writing and brought before the Senate, having notified the committee that they intended to do so, an additional proposition involving the recognition of the independence of the Republic of Cuba. There was no other proposition submitted to the committee in the nature of an adverse report, or a minority report, or a supplementary report, or any other kind of a report.

Mr. FRYE. Except, if the Senator remembers, that the Senator from Maine—I do not know about stating these committee proceedings, but as we are going into this, as the Senator from Georgia would say, somewhat brusquely——

Mr. BACON. No; I did not use that phrase.

Mr. FRYE. When those Senators said they were going to make this reservation, I said immediately that I would reserve the right to put this in.

Mr. MORGAN. The other Senators, though, instead of merely indicating what they intended to reserve and bring into the Senate, presented it and had it signed. But the Senator from Maine seems to have reserved something. I do not think there is anything in the shape of a report in a mere reservation. It is in the mind of the Senator. He did not make it known to the committee as an adverse report or a minority report.

Mr. TILLMAN. Or as a supplementary report.

Mr. MORGAN. Or as a supplementary report or any other kind of a report.

Mr. TELLER. It is not a report at all.

Mr. MORGAN. It is not a report.

Mr. FRYE. It was not intended to be a report at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator from Alabama who was formerly the distinguished chairman of that committee know any Senator who is in favor of the resolution which the Senator from Maine has just presented?

Mr. MORGAN. I know that some Senators voted for it there.

Mr. CHANDLER. Are we at liberty to know the name of any Senator who is in favor of that resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. I am not able to tell you. You can hire one of the gentlemen in the gallery to find out. They find out everything else.

Mr. GALLINGER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. FAULKNER. I rise to a question of order. I do not think this debate is in order at all.

Mr. FRYE. I do not think it is in order at all.

Mr. FAULKNER. It is not in order to investigate what has occurred privately in a committee room. It is an executive session of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point is well taken and is sustained by the Chair.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not in order for another reason.

Mr. QUAY. I call for the regular order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the special order be executed. In the meantime I yield to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE], to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill, and if there is no objection to the passage of the bill I will allow it to be considered, after which I shall ask the Senate to proceed with the pension bills.

Mr. BATE. There will be no trouble about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well.

KNOXVILLE, TENN., A PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. BATE. I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill (H. R. 7943) to make Knoxville, Tenn., a port of delivery, and to create the office of surveyor of customs.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF JAMES W. SCHAUMBURG.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he will allow me to withdraw the motion I made the other day to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 1268 was passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield for that purpose, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent to withdraw a motion to reconsider. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion is withdrawn.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the title of the bill be read.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1268) for the relief of the legal representatives and devisees of James W. Schaumburg.

Mr. TELLER. I thought the bill needed an amendment, but I found afterwards it did not. I therefore withdraw the motion.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. PASCO. I ask that it may be understood that after the special order is entered upon no other business except pension bills shall be considered during the remainder of the session.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is agreeable to me, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CHILTON. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit me to call up a bill which has been here for some time. It is very short.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have yielded half an hour of my time, and I think the Senator from Texas will not ask me to yield any more. Yes, I will yield for that bill. The Senator is always courteous. After it is disposed of, I shall insist upon the special order.

GAINESVILLE, M'ALESTER AND ST. LOUIS RAILWAY.

Mr. CHILTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3707) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act to grant to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory."

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now let the first bill on the Pension Calendar be read.

Mr. CHANDLER. Was the order made which the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] asked for, that there should be no other business transacted to-day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was.

JOHN C. WAGONER.

The bill (H. R. 4300) to increase the pension of John C. Wagoner was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place the name of John C. Wagoner, late chief packer, Custer's expedition against the Indians, on the pension roll, and to pay said John C. Wagoner a pension of $12 per month, in lieu of the pension now received by him.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BENJAMIN F. HOWLAND.

The bill (H. R. 1322) granting a pension to Benjamin F. Howland was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Benjamin F. Howland, late of the whale ship Edward, Mexican war, and to pay him a pension of $8 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SARAH A. LANDRAM.

The bill (H. R. 4247) granting a pension to Sarah A. Landram was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place upon the pension roll the name of Sarah A. Landram, widow of the late William J. Landram, colonel of the Nineteenth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and to pay her a pension of $30 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM J. WILLIAMS.

The bill (S. 3722) granting a pension to William J. Williams was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 7, before the word "Delaware," to strike out "First" and insert "Sixth;" and in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty" and insert "eight;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William J. Williams, late a private in Company G, Sixth Delaware Infantry Volunteers, and pay him a pension of $8 per month.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GALLINGER, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to William J. Williams."

CATHERINE CHILDERS.

The bill (S. 3705) granting a pension to Catherine Chalders was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 5, after the name "Catherine," to strike out "Chalders" and insert "Childers;" in the same line, after the letter "A.," to strike out "Chalders" and insert "Childers;" and in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "eight;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Catherine Childers, widow of Samuel A. Childers, late second lieutenant Company M, Third Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Cavalry, at the rate of $8 per month.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Catherine Childers."

HELEN LARNED.

The bill (H. R. 2426) granting an increase of pension to Helen Larned was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Helen Larned, widow of the late Frank H. Larned, major, First Regiment United States Artillery, and to pay her a pension of $25 per month on and after the passage of this act, the same to be in lieu of her present pension.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGERETT FERRITER.

The bill (S. 4269) granting a pension to Margerett Ferriter was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Margerett Ferriter, widow of Patrick Ferriter, late private of Company F, Twenty-fourth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and to pay her a pension of $8 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MORITZ TSCHOEPE.

The bill (H. R. 4314) to increase the pension of Moritz Tschoepe was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Moritz Tschoepe, late of Company C, Twenty-fourth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers, and to pay him a pension of $24 per month, in lieu of the pension now being paid him.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JACOB G. FRICK.

The bill (H. R. 4206) granting an increase of pension to Jacob G. Frick was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place the name of Jacob G. Frick, late lieutenant-colonel Ninety-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, colonel One hundred and twenty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and colonel Twenty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Militia, on the pension roll of the United States, and to pay him a pension of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN THURSTON.

The bill (H. R. 2629) to grant a pension to John Thurston was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place upon the pension roll, at $8 per month, the name of John Thurston, of Island Pond, Vt., for service done by him as steward on board the U. S. revenue cutter Morris during the Mexican war.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GALLINGER, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to grant a pension to John Thurston."

EUNICE TAYLOR.

The bill (H. R. 90) granting a pension to Eunice Taylor was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Eunice Taylor, a hospital nurse during the civil war, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AUGUSTE WHITMER.

The bill (H. R. 92) granting a pension to Auguste Whitmer was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Auguste Whitmer, the widow of Henry Whitmer, late a private in Company B, Ninth New York Heavy Artillery, and Company B, Tenth Veteran Reserve Corps, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month, in lieu of that which she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

word "of," to strike out the letter "P." and insert "Plum;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Plum P. Miner, late of Company B, Twelfth Indiana Infantry, on the pension roll, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Plum P. Miner."

EPHRAIM C. BALDWIN.

The bill (S. 3668) granting an increase of pension to Ephriam C. Baldwin was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty-five;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ephriam C. Baldwin, late second lieutenant Company D, First California Cavalry, at the rate of $35 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move, in line 6, to change the word "Ephriam" to "Ephraim."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GALLINGER, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Ephraim C. Baldwin."

CHARLES B. EADES.

The bill (H. R. 639) increasing the pension of Charles B. Eades, Hopkinsville, Ky., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Charles B. Eades, late private, Company K, Eleventh Kentucky Infantry Volunteers, and to pay him a pension of $24 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GALLINGER, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill increasing the pension of Charles B. Eades."

M. LOUISE ANDERSON.

The bill (H. R. 5994) to grant a pension to Mrs. M. Louise Anderson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place upon the pension roll the name of M. Louise Anderson, widow of John B. Anderson, late of Company K, Seventeenth Regiment Michigan Infantry, at $24 a month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GALLINGER, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to grant a pension to M. Louise Anderson."

WILLIAM RUSSELL.

The bill (S. 3002) to pension William Russell for services in Oregon Indian wars was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 10, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twelve" and insert "eight;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension roll the name of William Russell, of Capt. Samuel Gordon's Company H, Oregon Volunteers, also of Capt. Edward Sheffield's Company A, of said volunteers, for meritorious service and for wounds received in August, 1856, by hostile Indians in Oregon, then a Territory, and allow him a pension at the rate of $8 per month.

Mr. McBRIDE. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire, the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, that that amendment is not shown to have been adopted by the committee or to have been suggested by the Senator who reported the bill. I think it is a misprint.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that it is not a misprint, although it does not appear in the report of the committee. The pension allowed to soldiers of Indian wars who have proved their claims in the Pension Bureau is $8 a month, and the committee does not see any reason, when they waive the question as to the proof of their claims, for making the pension more than $8 a month by special act. I will say to the Senator that we have amended all similar bills on these lines, and I hope he will not object to the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM P. ARBLE.

The bill (S. 3724) granting a pension to William P. Arble was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of William P. Arble, a Mexican war veteran, at $12 per month.

Mr. GALLINGER. The words "and to pay him a pension" do not appear in that bill. I ask that they may be inserted. The other House insists upon that. In line 6, after the word "veteran," I move to insert "and pay him a pension;" so as to read:

And pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN D. COULIE.

The bill (S. 1537) granting a pension to John D. Coulie was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eighteen" and insert "twelve;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John D. Coulie, late of Company H, First Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Heavy Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JANE H. SANDBORN.

The bill (H. R. 2074) granting a pension to Jane H. Sandborn was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Jane H. Sandborn, dependent daughter of Gilman J. Sandborn, late a private in Company K, Third Regiment Minnesota Volunteers, and to pay her a pension of $12 a month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID N. THOMPSON.

The bill (H. R. 777) to increase the pension of David N. Thompson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of David N. Thompson, late a private of Company C, Thirty-fourth Regiment Illinois Infantry Volunteers, and to pay him a pension of $35 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID HUNTER.

The bill (S. 895) granting a pension to David Hunter was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, after the word "Infantry," to insert "and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of the rate he is now receiving;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of David Hunter, late first lieutenant and adjutant of the Thirty-fifth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of the rate he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAUL CARR.

The bill (S. 1539) granting a pension to Paul Carr was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seventy-two" and insert "thirty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Paul Carr, late of the U. S. S. Princeton and of the New Ironsides, and to pay him the sum of $30 a month from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to further amend the bill, in line 7, before the word "thirty," by striking out "the sum of" and inserting "a pension at the rate of;" so as to read:

And to pay him a pension at the rate of $30 a month from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JANE A. WILKINSON.

The bill (H. R. 7536) granting a pension to Jane A. Wilkinson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place upon the pension roll the name of Jane A. Wilkinson, who was the widow of Martin L. Stone, late a captain in Company I, Second Pennsylvania Cavalry, and to pay her a pension of $20 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELISABETH LANE.

The bill (H. R. 2015) granting a pension to Elisabeth Lane was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Elisabeth Lane, widow of Joseph Lane, captain Company F, Forty-third Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and to pay her a pension of $40 per month in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PETTUS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. TURPIE. I hope the Senator will not insist upon that motion. There are several bills yet to be considered in which Senators are interested.

Mr. GALLINGER. Unanimous consent was given, I will say to the Senator from Alabama, that we should spend an hour in the consideration of pension bills.

Mr. PETTUS. Very well. Then I will withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is withdrawn.

ROSA KARGER.

The bill (H. R. 239) granting an increase of pension to Rosa Karger was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Rosa Karger, widow of William Karger, late a landsman on the ships North Carolina, Susquehanna, and Vermont, in the United States Navy, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month in lieu of any which she may be now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CORNELIA M. MASON.

The bill (S. 3111) granting a pension to Cornelia M. Mason was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "thirty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Cornelia M. Mason, widow of John S. Mason, late brevet brigadier-general, United States Army, at the rate of $30 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BETTIE HORD BROWN.

The bill (S. 1472) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Bettie Hord Brown was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Mrs. Bettie Hord Brown, widow of Orlando Brown, late lieutenant-colonel of the Fourteenth Kentucky Infantry Volunteers, United States Army, and to allow her a pension of $30 a month, the same to be in lieu of the pension now being paid her as widow as aforesaid.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend the bill, in line 5, by striking out the word "Mrs." before the name "Bettie Hord Brown;" and in line 8, after the word "month," by striking out "the same to be in lieu of the pension now being paid her as widow as aforesaid" and to insert "in lieu of that which she is now receiving."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Bettie Hord Brown."

MARY E. LAW.

The bill (S. 140) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Law was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Mary E. Law, widow of Capt. Richard Law, United States Navy, at $50 per month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

Mr. GALLINGER. In line 7, after the word "Navy," I move to insert "and pay her a pension;" so as to read:

And pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES M'ALLISTER.

The bill (H. R. 298) granting an increase of pension to Charles McAllister was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to grant to Charles McAllister, late a private in Company K, One hundred and nineteenth Pennsylvania Volunteers, and to pay him a pension of $24 per month, in lieu of the pension which he now receives.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NOAH PILLSBURY.

The bill (S. 1031) granting a pension to Noah Pillsbury was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 5, after the words "subject to the," to strike out "general pension laws and regulations" and insert "provisions and limitations of the pension laws;" and in line 8, after the word "Infantry," to insert ", and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month, no deduction to be made for payments heretofore allowed to the soldier;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Noah Pillsbury, late private of Company E, Twenty-fifth Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month, no deduction to be made for payments heretofore allowed to the soldier.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why is the provision inserted, "no deduction to be made for payments heretofore allowed to the soldier?" Is it intended to give him arrears?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all. Those words were inserted for the reason that the soldier was on the pension roll and was afterwards dropped, and I understand the Pension Bureau is now ruling that when we pass a private pension bill restoring a soldier to the pension roll, they will deduct the payments given to him while he was on the roll—an utterly unjust thing, it seems to me.

Mr. COCKRELL. How is that?

Mr. GALLINGER. They simply deduct from his future payments. They will not pay him any pension until the payments they had made are canceled; and this simply provides that he shall be paid a pension under the provisions of this law without making such deduction.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not understand that. That would be a remarkable construction of law.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what is being done.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then the bill should read, "and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 a month from this date."

Mr. GALLINGER. I think, unless the words "no deduction to be made for payments heretofore allowed to the soldier" are inserted, that the Pension Bureau would insist upon making the deduction. I would say that I received this suggestion from an officer of the Bureau—that they did make these deductions. If the Senator can use any better language—I wrote the amendment in the bill very hurriedly—I am willing to accept it. What we want to do is to avoid such deductions. In my opinion the man never ought to have been dropped from the pension roll, but he was dropped.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is a very serious question. There are a great many of these cases coming up, and the question is whether the Pension Office is going to boldly strike out and say that if they drop a man from the pension rolls and we subsequently restore him, they will deduct all that has been paid him. It would simply be infamous to make such a decision as that.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is precisely the position they have taken.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no tolerance for it at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Neither have I.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I would insert "at the rate of $12 per month from this date, without any deduction."

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. COCKRELL. Striking out "no deduction to be made," and let the bill read: "pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month from this date, without any deduction."

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right. I have no objection to the change of phraseology.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment reported by the committee so as to read:

And pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month from this date, without any deduction.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I can hardly think that the Pension Office, or whoever is in charge of the payment of pensions, has made any ruling which goes to the extent which is supposed. It seems impossible that they should do so.

Mr. COCKRELL. It struck me that way, also.

Mr. GALLINGER. We will be frank about this matter. I did not get this information from the Commissioner of Pensions or the Deputy Commissioner of Pensions, but the Commissioner of Pensions has detailed a very competent man to examine pension bills in the other House. I sent this bill to him for a brief, which he very kindly submitted to me, and made a suggestion in his letter to me that unless a provision of this kind was inserted in the bill a deduction would be made at the Pension Bureau. That is all I know about it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to the amendment of the committee; but I want to put it in such a form that it will not carry the idea that we are to take anything back.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course we would not allow that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARTHA M. M'CALL.

The bill (H. R. 7539) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Martha M. McCall, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to increase the pension of Martha M. McCall, widow of William Wallace McCall, a soldier of the Mexican war, to $15 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GALLINGER, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Martha M. McCall."

Mr. COCKRELL. That includes all the bills which have been reported except those reported yesterday, and we have not copies of the bills or reports in those cases.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are all printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know, but they have not been placed on our desks. I suggest that the remainder of the pension bills go over for to-day, and we can take them up hereafter.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection to that; but I should like, if the Senator would permit, to have the bill to increase the pension of the widow of Brig. Gen. Joseph C. Abbott taken up. It passed at the last session and ought to have been reported in the beginning of this Congress. I hope the Senator will permit that bill to be considered.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is all right.

ELLEN C. ABBOTT.

The bill (S. 4204) to increase the pension of Ellen C. Abbott, widow of Bvt. Brig. Gen. Joseph C. Abbott, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Ellen C. Abbott, widow of Joseph C. Abbott, late colonel of the Seventh Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry and brevet brigadier-general United States Volunteers, and to pay her a pension of $30 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to increase the pension of Ellen C. Abbott."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 14, 1898, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 13, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills and resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Concurrent resolution.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed for the use of the Senate and House of Representatives 20,000 copies, to be included in one volume, of the message of the President of the United States on the relation of the United States to Spain, and the message of the President of the United States transmitting consular correspondence respecting the condition of the reconcentrados in Cuba, the state of the war in that island, and the prospects of the projected autonomy, 13,500 for the use of the House of Representatives and 6,500 copies for the use of the Senate.

S. 3684. An act for the relief of Joseph Tousaint, alias Touzen;

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 7445) to amend "An act authorizing the construction of a railway, street railway, motor, wagon, and pedestrian bridge over the Missouri River, near Council Bluffs, Iowa, and Omaha, Nebr.," and to extend the time for the completion of the bridge therein provided for.

PRINTING OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE ON CUBA, ETC.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask consent to call up, on behalf of the Committee on Printing, the resolution received from the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS] asks unanimous consent to call up the resolution which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed for the use of the Senate and House of Representatives 20,000 copies, to be included in one volume, of the message of the President of the United States on the relation of the United States to Spain, and the message of the President of the United States transmitting consular correspondence respecting the condition of the reconcentrados in Cuba, the state of the war in that island, and the prospects of the projected autonomy, 13,500 for the use of the House of Representatives and 6,500 copies for the use of the Senate.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution; which was adopted.

FREE ZONE OF MEXICO.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have been directed by the Committee on Ways and Means to call up for passage joint resolution No. 27; and I now give notice that at the first opportunity after to-day, it being a privileged matter, I will call it up for the action of the House. It relates to the Free Zone of Mexico.

A MEMBER. I object to it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You can not object, because it is a privileged matter and an objection will not avail. We will call it up and see what disposition may be made of it. I will not call it up now.

TENNESSEE ELECTION CONTEST—PATTERSON VS. CARMACK.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I desire to give notice, on behalf of the Committee on Elections No. 3, that the contested-election case of Patterson vs. Carmack will be called up on Monday next for the action of the House.

IMPROVING NEW BEDFORD HARBOR, MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. BARRETT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (S. 4127) to provide for dredging the channel in the harbor of New Bedford, Mass., was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BAILEY. I reserve the right to object. I want to hear some explanation.

Mr. DAVEY. I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BARRETT. If the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DAVEY] understood this matter, I think he would not object. I ask him to hear a statement of the case, reserving the right to object.

Mr. DAVEY. Very well; I will reserve the right to object.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I trust that gentlemen who may entertain any objection to this measure will be allowed by the silence of the House to hear a statement which I think will overcome any such objection.

I wish to state in advance, before making any comments or explanation with reference to the matter, that the disposition of the question does not concern my own district, but concerns a district not now represented on the floor of the House by reason of the recent death of the member from that district.

This bill proposes to appropriate the sum of $34,000 to dredge a channel, a new bridge over which is now almost completed, to connect the city of New Bedford and the town of Fairhaven,

Mass. The peculiar condition which makes it necessary to ask the appropriation at this time I desire briefly to explain to the House. When it is understood, I think there can be no objection to the appropriation.

A new bridge is now almost completed across the river between New Bedford and Fairhaven, built by order of the legislature of the State of Massachusetts. On the construction more than a half million of dollars has been expended. The old bridge had a draw over the channel of the river to provide for the upper navigation of the river. When the new bridge was authorized to be constructed to take the place of the old one, before the construction was begun the General Government required that the draw should be changed and placed some 900 feet farther east than the location of the old draw.

In compliance with that order of the War Department, the county of Bristol located the new draw 900 feet east of the old location. Now the bridge is almost ready to be opened, and the General Government, although it ordered the placing of this draw at the point I have indicated, has not constructed or dredged the new channel to accommodate traffic on the river so as to enter the new draw located by order of the War Department. It is impossible for the bridge to be finished until the channel is opened by this appropriation.

It is simply, therefore, a matter of agreement or implied contract. The Government ordered the county of Bristol to do one thing, which was done; and the matter now rests with the Government to perform its share of the agreement. It is, therefore, a simple matter of right and justice that requires the carrying out of the implied contract of the Government; and therefore we ask the appropriation embodied in this bill.

I will say to the House that it has been fully considered by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and reported by them unanimously. It was the unanimous vote of the committee, notwithstanding the fact that many members of the committee believed that on general principles no appropriation for isolated improvements should be made in this session of Congress. But realizing that this was a case in the interest of the Government, a case in which the Government itself was largely involved, the committee, as I have said, unanimously agreed to the report.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. BRUMM. I understand this bill carries an appropriation?

Mr. BARRETT. Yes, sir; it does—$34,000.

Mr. BRUMM. And an appropriation for the liquidation of an implied contract?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if this would not go properly into the river and harbor bill?

Mr. BARRETT. I will state to the gentleman from Texas that this item would go properly into any river and harbor bill, as it carries out an implied agreement made by the Government, under which the county of Bristol, Mass., made the appropriation for this work.

Mr. BAILEY. It would not necessarily go into any appropriation bill, such as the Post-Office appropriation bill or the Indian appropriation bill; but if the House was given an opportunity to pass a river and harbor bill, this item would have appeared there.

Mr. BARRETT. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. It seems to me that it is a proper item, and yet it is no more proper than a hundred others which will have no day in the House at this session of Congress.

However, because the committee has seen fit to deny to the other members the opportunity of presenting for consideration items of appropriation equally as worthy, I am not going to make any personal objection to this item. But it does seem wrong that a hundred and fifty or two hundred members, with appropriations as meritorious as this, shall be denied any opportunity of consideration while a few favored measures are permitted to pass through by unanimous consent.

Mr. BARRETT. There is not a man here upon this floor, let me say to the gentleman, who has worked harder than I, during this session, to secure the consideration of a river and harbor bill. I supported it in committee, and I believe in it now. But that has nothing to do with this matter. This is a peculiar case. Nothing like this has been brought to the attention of the House heretofore. It involves the good faith of the Government. There is no disputing the facts. I hope, therefore, no gentleman will object to the consideration of this meritorious measure at this time.

Mr. BRUMM. Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the gentleman answer my question. The gentleman says this bill carries an appropriation, and that that is based upon an implied contract on the part of the Government to do a certain thing. Would it not properly belong to the Committee on Claims? If so, I shall object.

Mr. BARRETT. I do not think it belongs to the Committee on Claims, because there has been no claim put in here.

Mr. BRUMM. You say it is on an implied contract?

Mr. BARRETT. It is. The Government told these people to do a certain thing, and thereby agreed itself to do another thing in the event of the first thing being done. The first thing has been done, and now let the Government do its part.

Mr. BRUMM. You make that assertion. I claim it should go to the proper committee for the purpose of investigating these facts.

Mr. BARRETT. It is not a claim. It is a request that the Government do what it said it would do.

Mr. BRUMM. That is your assertion.

Mr. BARRETT. Nobody disputes that assertion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BRUMM. I think I shall object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

A MEMBER. Oh, do not do that.

Mr. BRUMM. I will, until I get some better understanding of it.

BRIDGE OVER BLACK RIVER, POCAHONTAS, ARK.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3457) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Black River, at or near Pocahontas, Ark.

The bill was read. It provides that it shall be lawful for the Pocahontas Bridge Company, a corporation duly and legally incorporated under the laws of the State of Arkansas, its successors or assigns, to construct and maintain a bridge over the Black River, at or near Pocahontas, in Randolph County, Ark. Said bridge shall be constructed to provide for the passage of railway trains, and, at the option of the persons by whom it may be built, may be used for the passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, and for foot passengers, for such reasonable rates of toll as may be approved from time to time by the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McCULLOCH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JOHN F. STEWART.

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5070) for the relief of the widow of Lieut. John F. Stewart.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas Lieut. John F. Stewart, late of Company A, Fourth Regiment United States Infantry, in active line of service, was promoted and appointed and did serve faithfully and acceptably as a second lieutenant of said company from July 22, 1865, until June 19, 1866; and

Whereas the company having been so far from headquarters during its entire period of service in the Northwestern Territories that he failed to receive his commission as second lieutenant, to which he was equitably entitled, and failed also to receive the pay and emoluments due him for his services as second lieutenant: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the widow of Lieut. John F. Stewart, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum or sums as the accounting officer of the Treasury shall find to be due Lieut. John F. Stewart as pay and emoluments for his services in the United States Army prior to his death in the late war, and that his widow is hereby entitled to and shall receive the same benefits as if said Stewart had received his commission at the time he was appointed a second lieutenant.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. I should like to hear the report read.

Mr. LINNEY. I call for the reading of the report of the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. LOUD. If the man is entitled to anything under the law, he can surely get it. It seems to me we ought not to anticipate the action of the Department.

Mr. LINNEY. One trouble is his commission was never issued. If the gentleman will listen to the reading of the report, he will find that it will explain the whole thing.

The report (by Mr. DAVIDSON of Wisconsin) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5070) for the relief of the widow of Lieut. John F. Stewart, deceased, submit the following report:

John F. Stewart was first sergeant in Company A, Fourth United States Volunteer Infantry. On the 29th day of July, 1865, while his company was stopping at St. Louis, Mo., while en route to Dakota, his said company was without a second lieutenant, and the said John F. Stewart was promoted to that rank with the understanding that he should receive his commission as such. He served faithfully and in a very acceptable manner in that capacity during the entire service of the company in the Northwest, and until its final discharge at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., on June 19, 1866.

His captain, Samuel G. Sewall, makes affidavit that it was his understanding that Lieut. John F. Stewart was to be commissioned as such, and that he did all in his power to have his commission made out, but being so far from headquarters he failed to accomplish it. Captain Sewall further states that Lieut. John F. Stewart performed all the duties of the office of second lieutenant faithfully and satisfactorily, and was fully entitled to the commission which was promised him. The said John F. Stewart has since died.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill, and attach hereto affidavit of Capt. Samuel G. Sewall and a letter from the Secretary of War, inclosing a report from the Adjutant-General, and ask that it be printed as a part of this report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, there is almost too much confusion, I suppose, to get any explanation; but I want to say to the gentleman in perfect good faith that the only effect this bill can have—and I question whether it can even have any effect of a beneficial character—is perhaps this, that by Congress saying that this man is a lieutenant he might be entitled to this pay.

I can not say as to whether that would be the effect or not, but that is the only effect this bill can have. If this man was a lieutenant and entitled to his pay as such, and never received it, then his widow can go to the accounting officer of the War Department and get that money. The records of the War Department show that this man was not a lieutenant, and if it is proposed to have this bill say that he was a lieutenant, and you hope to get the money for this widow on that account, why I shall most assuredly object. I should like some explanation from the gentleman as to the meaning and intent of the bill.

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Speaker, the report of the committee shows that he was a lieutenant, that he performed all the services of a lieutenant. There is the report of the captain in whose company he acted, and there is also the report of the Adjutant-General. Then there is the report of William C. Endicott, Secretary of War, all to that effect. He was really appointed, but for some cause or other, stated in the report, the commission never issued. So that the only trouble in the way at all is that the records of the War Department do not show that a commission was issued, whereas the testimony of the captain, the testimony of the Adjutant-General, and the testimony of the Secretary of War all agree that he was really a lieutenant, but that the commission failed to issue. This is recommended by all of them, and has been passed upon by the Committee on War Claims, and they have favorably reported it.

Mr. LOUD. I do not believe that bill will give this widow anything.

Mr. LINNEY. If it does not, then no harm will come of it.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LINNEY. Yes; and I will answer it if I can.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Was not the reason that he was not mustered in the fact that his company was reduced below the minimum, and therefore under the law was not entitled to have three officers—a condition similar to that in which many other officers were?

Mr. LINNEY. I think not, sir. The report does not show that. The testimony of the captain of whose company he was a member and also of other officers is to the effect that he was really a lieutenant.

Mr. CONNOLLY. He was a lieutenant; but under the law the company was not entitled to have three officers in the company as being below the minimum.

Mr. STEELE. Under the act of March, 1863.

Mr. CONNOLLY. That applies to nearly every company in the Army, certainly to every regiment.

Mr. LINNEY. That does not appear from the report, and it has been very carefully investigated by the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. CONNOLLY. That may be true; and if he was detailed as lieutenant and the appointment certified to the proper authority, he would have been commissioned if the company had been entitled to three officers.

Mr. LINNEY. He only gets, however, under the resolution, such sum as found due by the accounting officers of the War Department.

Mr. CONNOLLY. But this recognizes him as mustered in as a second lieutenant when he was not, and the company was not entitled to it. That would make this officer an exception to every officer of the Army in precisely the same condition.

Mr. LINNEY. With all due respect to the gentleman, I will state that those who ought to know best state the facts just as they are set out in the report.

Mr. CONNOLLY. But they do not state the company was entitled to the third commissioned officer. At that period of the war nearly all the companies were reduced below a minimum, and whenever a vacancy occurred the vacancy was not filled.

Mr. LINNEY. It does state, with all due deference to the gentleman, that he was appointed a lieutenant.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I understand he was appointed, but the company was not entitled to a lieutenant.

Mr. LINNEY. He was appointed and the commission never issued, but he performed the services.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Plenty of men did that, for the same reason that the company was not entitled to have that vacancy filled.

Mr. LINNEY. This resolution proposes to pay him such amount as is found due him as such lieutenant by the accounting officers of the Treasury.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Is there anything due him as sergeant?

Mr. LINNEY. There may be.

Mr. LOUD. Why not strike out the word "lieutenant?"

Mr. LINNEY. It is a very small matter.

Mr. LOUD. Well, there is no doubt, let me say to the gentleman, that if this man was a lieutenant he either got his money or the money can be gotten, if it is due to him. These are two plain, apparent facts to anyone that has anything to do with the Treasury Department.

Mr. LINNEY. But he has never gotten anything.

Mr. LOUD. Why not strike out the word "lieutenant," and if anything is due to John F. Stewart, late of Company A, Fourth Regiment United States Infantry, let him go and get it?

Mr. LINNEY. I would state to the gentleman that the War Department says that this is the proper and fair way to do it.

Mr. LOUD. But this makes him a lieutenant, while he may not have been.

Mr. LINNEY. I only know what the report shows, and if you will read the report you will see it.

Mr. LOUD. I know if he was an officer he must have been regularly appointed and regularly commissioned.

Mr. LINNEY. I know that that would usually follow; but here is an extraordinary case, where from some cause he was not commissioned, and he simply asks this if it appears to them it is due to him by the facts as stated.

Mr. LOUD. Why not strike out the word "lieutenant?"

Mr. LINNEY. I prefer not doing it. They say these are the facts and findings by these various officers.

Mr. LOUD. Does it appear that he performed the duties of lieutenant?

Mr. LINNEY. He acted as such for some time, and was requested to act as such. He was de facto lieutenant, as I understand.

Mr. McINTIRE. Did he receive the pay?

Mr. LINNEY. He never received anything for it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LINNEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ARTICLES IMPORTED FOR TEXAS STATE FAIR AND EXPOSITION FREE OF DUTY.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 14).

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 14) authorizing articles imported from foreign countries for the sole purpose of exhibition at the Texas State Fair and Exposition, to be held at Dallas, Tex., in 1897, to be imported free of duty, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Resolved, etc., That all articles which shall be imported from foreign countries for the sole purpose of exhibition at the Texas State Fair and Exposition, to be held at Dallas, Tex., in October, 1897, upon which there shall be a tariff or customs duty shall be admitted free of payment of duty, customs fees, or charges, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; but it shall be lawful at any time during the exhibition to sell, for delivery at the close of said fair and exposition, any goods or property imported for and actually on exhibition in the fair and exposition buildings or on their grounds, subject to such regulations for the security of the revenue and for the collection of import duties as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: Provided, That all such articles, when sold or withdrawn for consumption in the United States, shall be subject to the duty, if any, imposed upon such article by the revenue laws in force at the date of importation, and all penalties prescribed by law shall be applied and enforced against such articles and against the persons who may be guilty of any illegal sale or withdrawal.

SEC. 2. That for the purposes of the execution of this act, Dallas, Tex., may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, be a port of delivery in the customs collection district in which it is situated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, before this bill, reported from the Committee on Ways and Means without objection at the time, is passed, it is proper that the House should be informed of the precedent that it sets. This is a bill which authorizes the free importation of articles for exhibition at the Texas State Fair, to be held at Dallas in October next, such articles to pay the usual duty in case they are subsequently sold in this country. It provides that all the expenses in connection with the protection of the revenue in view of these importations for exhibition shall be paid by the State fair. Therefore there is no expense for the Government in connection with the matter.

Mr. BURKE. Not one dollar.

Mr. DINGLEY. This is the first time this privilege has been given to any State fair of the country, and of course it is a precedent that may be extended to other State fairs. But as the State fair of Texas, in order to avail itself of this privilege, must pay all the expense incident to it, that will undoubtedly deter most other State exhibitions from ever availing themselves of the privilege. It is but just that the House should understand the character of this proposed legislation and what it may lead up to.

Mr. BURKE. I will state that the Texas State Fair is not only abundantly able, but willing to pay all the expenses.

Mr. DINGLEY. And it ought to be said, Mr. Speaker, that the State fair in Texas is peculiarly situated, because Texas is adjacent to Mexico, and it is expected that most of these articles that will be imported for exhibition at the Texas State Fair will come from Mexico.

Mr. BURKE. Exclusively from the Republic of Mexico.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object to the consideration of this bill, although I voted against it in committee and I shall vote against it in the House. I do not believe in going into a policy of extending this to State, county, or town fairs. This practice has come upon the country since the international exposition had this privilege granted to it. Then they extended it to the local cities, Nashville and Omaha, and now comes in requests from every State fair. We have other requests from other State affairs in the country. I for one want to make my positive protest as well as cast my vote against the policy of going into any such legislation as this.

Mr. CANNON. Why not amend the bill and make it apply to all State fairs?

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to join with the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] who has just sat down in a protest against this bill. I think it is a piece of vicious legislation. No good reason can be adduced for extending this advantage to the Texas State Fair that can not be adduced in favor of any county or city fair, for that matter. There is a permanent exhibition in my own city of Pittsburg, and there is no more reason why this advantage should be given to the Texas State Fair than there would be to give the same advantage to the city of Pittsburg, a thing for which I would never dream of asking.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, that is all very well for gentlemen who live in the interior, who have no appreciation of the situation near the border. For instance, I should be very glad to have the same opportunity extended to our State fair, and I should ask for it with no feeling of apology, because our nearest neighbors very largely contribute to the success of these fairs. Here is the great State of Texas that for ten years was a republic, a neighbor of Mexico, and their communication is much freer with that Republic than it is with Pennsylvania. What hurt does it do? They pay all the expenses; they add to the commerce and to the glory of the State of Texas and of the Republic by inviting and encouraging these exhibitions.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURKE] whether this bill is accompanied by a report?

Mr. BURKE. It is accompanied by a report from the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. HENDERSON. A unanimous report?

Mr. BURKE. There is no minority report. I do not know how the vote was in the committee.

Mr. DALZELL. There is no minority report, but it was not passed in committee by a unanimous vote.

Mr. HENDERSON. It occurred to me that if there were objections to it, they ought to be put in some form. Let me ask the gentleman from Texas another question, for there was so much noise I could not hear the bill read. Is the proposition to send exhibits from the Government here to the fair?

Mr. BURKE. No, sir; nothing of the sort.

Mr. HENDERSON. What is it?

Mr. BURKE. The Texas State Fair has been in successful operation for thirteen years. It has contributed more to the development and upbuilding of that State than any other one agency. The management of the Texas State Fair has received the assurance of at least three States across the Rio Grande, in our sister Republic of Mexico—not only that, but the quasi assurance of Mexico itself—that they will send to our next State fair, to be held the coming October, a considerable number of exhibits. Now, this bill simply provides that these articles can be imported across the Rio Grande—in substance, not in words—imported into this country, and that so far as the watching, keeping, guarding, and in fact all expenses connected with these exhibits, are to be paid for by the Texas State Fair and the Dallas Exposition.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is to allow these exhibits to come in duty free?

Mr. BURKE. Yes.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is the bill sufficiently guarded so that no swindling can be done and no frauds perpetrated on the Government?

Mr. BURKE. Yes. I may state that this bill received the approval of the Treasury Department in this country, and that the very proviso that the committee added to it was drafted and prepared by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, no bill has ever been drawn that guarded against fraud effectually. There is always some leak. The Treasury Department did object to this bill, but finally yielded, and consented to its passage only on condition that all expenses should be paid for by the association, but they never have recommended the bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, there is a provision in the bill to the effect that if there shall be a desire to sell any goods imported into this country they shall pay the same duty as other goods. Of course that is entirely proper.

Mr. BURKE. That is incorporated in the bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. So that so far as the Treasury is concerned, that is entirely protected. The view which many members of the committee took was that this privilege, even if so extended as to become quite general, would never be availed of by ordinary State fairs on account of the large expense which would necessarily be incurred in protecting the imports. It is understood that in this case the Texas State Fair must pay the cost of guarding these goods during the exhibition. This is quite an expensive proceeding. The only objection that the Treasury Department has made was that there might be established a precedent calculated to cause a great deal of difficulty to the Treasury in the future. When it was agreed that the expenses should in every case be paid by the State fair, the Treasury officials made no further objection, although, as the gentleman from New York has well said, they did not recommend the measure.

Mr. BURKE. The Texas State Fair proposes to pay all expenses. The Government will not be out a nickel.

The question being taken, the amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURKE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the title will be amended in accordance with the amendment reported by the Clerk.

There was no objection.

IMPROVING NEW BEDFORD HARBOR, MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. BARRETT. I desire once more to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 4127) to provide for dredging the channel in the harbor of New Bedford, Mass.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I object.

MEDAL OF HONOR, UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 24) relative to the medal of honor authorized by the acts of December 21, 1861, and July 16, 1862.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue to any person to whom a medal of honor has been awarded, or may hereafter be awarded, under the provisions of the acts approved December 21, 1861, and July 16, 1862, a rosette or knot to be worn in lieu of the medal, and a ribbon to be worn with the medal; said rosette or knot and ribbon to be each of a pattern to be prescribed and established by the President of the United States, and any appropriation that may hereafter be available for the contingent expenses of the Navy Department is hereby made available for the purposes of this act: Provided, That whenever a ribbon issued under the provisions of this act shall have been lost, destroyed, or rendered unfit for use, without fault or neglect on the part of the person to whom it was issued, the Secretary of the Navy shall cause a new ribbon to be issued to such person without charge therefor.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution; which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CUMMINGS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

THEODORE F. SWAYZE.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1004) for the relief of Theodore F. Swayze, administrator de bonis non of the estate of John S. P. Wheeler, deceased.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to issue duplicates in the name of Theodore F. Swayze, administrator de bonis non of the estate of John S. P. Wheeler, deceased, in lieu of United States 4 per cent registered bonds issued under the acts of July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871, No. 30854, for $50; Nos. 174652, 175652, 175653, 176085, 176086, 176740, for $100 each; inscribed in the name of John S. P. Wheeler, and alleged to have been lost: Provided, That the said Theodore F. Swayze shall first file in the Treasury a bond in a penal sum equal to the amount of said missing bonds and the interest which would accrue thereon until the principal becomes due and payable, with two good and sufficient sureties, residents of the United States, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, with condition to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any claim because of the lost bonds.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE SENATOR EARLE.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, April 25, 1908, beginning at 2 o'clock p. m., be set apart for eulogies on the life and services of Hon. JOSEPH H. EARLE, late a Senator from the State of South Carolina.

Mr. COX. I wish to inquire whether the day named in this resolution is not the day already set apart for eulogies on the late Senator Harris of Tennessee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that this resolution does not conflict with any existing order.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution; and it was adopted.

WEST FORK RIVER, WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. DOVENER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 116) authorizing the Secretary of War to make a preliminary survey of the West Fork River, West Virginia, and prepare estimates of the cost thereof.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to cause a survey and submit an estimate for the improvement of the West Fork River, West Virginia, from its mouth to the city of Clarksburg, W. Va., by a system of locks and dams, the proper location of necessary dams, as well as probable cost thereof.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors was read, as follows:

Amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to make a survey of the West Fork River, West Virginia, and prepare estimates of the cost thereof."

Mr. DINGLEY. I wish to suggest that there should be incorporated in this joint resolution the usual amendment—that the Secretary of War be further requested to inform the House whether this improvement should be undertaken at the expense of the Government.

Mr. DOVENER. I assent to that amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to know whether this is not another of those items which ought to be included in a river and harbor bill?

Mr. DOVENER. This is a joint resolution providing merely for a preliminary survey and estimate. Provisions of this kind are adopted from time to time by joint resolution.

Mr. BAILEY. If I have any knowledge of river and harbor bills—and I am free to say I have no very great knowledge of them—they provide for these preliminary surveys.

Mr. DOVENER. Yes, sir. But this has not been provided for in any river and harbor bill; and propositions of this kind have been passed from time to time in the form of joint resolutions during the whole term of my service here.

Mr. BAILEY. Is not the gentleman from West Virginia a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors?

Mr. DOVENER. I am.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, if he is not divulging any of the secrets of the committee, was the gentleman in favor of a river and harbor bill at this session?

Mr. DOVENER. I was.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I will not make any objection. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title of the joint resolution was amended to conform to the amendment.

On motion of Mr. DOVENER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CONTESTED ELECTION—BROWN VS. SWANSON.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, by order of the Committee on Elections No. 3, I submit the report signed by four members of that committee, and ask that it be printed, and that the dissenting members have until ten days from now to file their report or views. This report refers to the case of Brown vs. Swanson.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I submit that a report by four members is not a report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Indiana suggests that this is submitted as a report by the order of the committee.

Mr. BARTLETT. I submit that it is not a report of the committee, in view of the fact, as the gentleman states himself, that less than a majority of the committee have signed the report.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman states that he was directed by the committee to make the report.

Mr. BARTLETT. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the House should not, and I hope will not, accept as the report of a committee a report which is signed by a minority of the members of the committee. Four members do not constitute a majority of the Committee on Elections, and the House should not accept such a report as a report of the committee.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the report is made by the order of the Committee on Elections, unanimously. This order was taken in committee, and whether the report be signed by a majority or a minority of the members is not a question to be now considered. Whether this be a minority or majority report will depend on the report to be hereafter submitted, if there shall be others submitted. There may be two or perhaps three other reports made. I have no knowledge of that fact. But this report is made by four members of the committee, and by the direction of the committee the gentleman from Indiana has been instructed to make the report to the House.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It was made by order of the committee.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. It has been done by the direction of a majority of the committee. The four members were permitted to file the views as submitted by Mr. CRUMPACKER. Hence this is the order of the committee.

Mr. LOUD. A majority of a quorum of the committee signed it?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. It is true that this is signed by a minority of the committee; but it has been done by the order of the committee.

Mr. SETTLE. That is to say, the committee directed the filing of the views of the four members?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Yes.

The SPEAKER. It does not seem that there is any particular question here involved affecting this contest, although the course of the committee is somewhat unusual.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to intrude on the rights of the committee or infringe on its privileges in any way—neither the committee nor its purposes. Nor do I desire to run counter to the wishes of a majority of the committee. But I desire that the House shall not establish a precedent by the action proposed here that a minority of a committee can file a report as a "report of the committee." I think I can in a few moments turn to the precedents upon this point. The House has already, on two occasions, at least, determined that the minority of a committee can not file such a report.

I do this on my own suggestion, and without conference with anyone, but simply that the precedents of the House and the rules of the House may not be violated, but that they shall be observed and enforced.

I state now that there can not be found an instance on the records of this House, in contested-election cases or in any other matter, where a minority of a committee when objection is made has been permitted to file a report of the committee.

Now, sir, a report of a committee is necessarily a report of a majority of the committee. The House permits the views of the minority to be filed not as the views of the committee, not as a report of the committee, but simply as the dissenting voice of the minority, who may differ with the majority of the committee; and if they do not at the time the report of the majority is submitted hand in their views, why then it requires unanimous consent afterwards.

Mr. Speaker, I say when the objection has been made, a minority of a committee upon elections or upon any other committee have never been allowed to file a report in this House. Why, Mr. Speaker, should a minority of a committee on elections, or a committee on any other subject, be permitted to bring into this House and file their views for its consideration until a majority of that committee have made a report? Why should a minority of a committee on elections be permitted to bring in here a resolution suggesting, as doubtless the views of this minority of this committee do suggest, that the contestee be unseated—a resolution which can be brought up at any time, when the majority of that committee are not of the opinion, I take it, that the contestee should be unseated?

I am not particular what report shall be made, but I am concerned that this House shall not depart from the long-established and well-recognized rules of the House, and that a minority of a committee shall not be permitted to suggest to the House what it shall do in any particular case. The question is not simply who shall occupy this seat. The question is one which it would be well for this House to consider, whether a minority of a committee, who have been unable to secure the votes of a majority to unseat a member, shall be permitted to come in and file a report and a resolution for the unseating of a member.

I read upon this subject from page 337 of the Manual, as decided in the Journal of the first session of the Twenty-fourth Congress, and also of the first session of the Fifty-first Congress, the following:

Authority to make a motion in behalf of a committee must be given by the committee. It is not sufficient that members of the committee have individually consented.

A minority of a committee can not make a report, a minority not being the committee.

Now, I maintain that it requires unanimous consent for anything to come in here from the minority until the majority have filed a report. I ask the ruling of the Speaker upon that. I read further from the Manual, on the same page:

The common practice, however, is to permit the minority to submit their views in writing, which are usually printed and considered with the majority report.

So I say, Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any rule of the House that permits a minority of a committee to file a report.

The SPEAKER. Let the Chair suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that what is stated to us is that the committee—not the four members, but the committee—have directed those four members to present their views, and the gentleman presenting them to ask consent of the House for ten days in which to file the views of the other members.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Just a word——

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. The statement of the Chair is correct. There are only four members of the committee who have agreed to this report. There are five other members. It is not quite sure that they will be able to agree on the same report. If the gentleman's position is tenable, then if the five disagreed and brought in two or more reports, a report could not be filed at all; but, in order to avoid that, the committee directed the four who had agreed to make this report.

The SPEAKER. As their views.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Yes; as their views, giving the other five ten days in which to prepare a unanimous report of the five or of such members joining as may agree upon it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I am not a member of that committee, and I did not know anything about it, but I am not yet prepared to yield my views upon that subject. I do not think that a minority of a committee can be authorized by a vote of that committee to present to this House a report, and I deny the right of the committee or of any committee to present to this House the views of a minority suggesting to the House the unseating of a member or the passage of a resolution or the passage of a bill.

It has never been done except in one case in this House, which was overlooked. In that case four members presented their views, and the Speaker, when the point was raised, stated, if my recollection is correct, in the case of Aldrich vs. Underwood, that it was too late to make the point, and that the point ought to have been made at the time that the report was filed. We had here, Mr. Speaker, the spectacle of a report made by four members of a committee, suggesting their views to the House unseating a member, when a majority of that committee were not in favor of it and had not authorized their report.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Most assuredly.

Mr. LACEY. Suppose the committee were unable to agree at all. Would that deprive the contestee or the contestant of the right to have this House determine which one of them is entitled to the seat? Would that deprive the House of an opportunity for action?

Mr. BARTLETT. I am only proposing that they shall come in here with a report, or at least I am not disposed, even if we could, to delay it from doing so. But I say it is a higher right than the suggestion the gentleman has made as to the proposition of any report, it is the right of the House to maintain its rules. These rules say that the minority of the committee can not come into the House and suggest that action should be taken. These are the rules I read to the House. There are two instances in which it has been held that it can not be done. But suppose the committee can not agree? The Committee on Foreign Affairs has not at this time been able to agree upon anything. Would it be suggested that the Democratic members could file their views and demand action at the hands of the House?

I apprehend if any such suggestion as that kind should be made every member on that side would antagonize it and insist on the point that the rules of the House provided that a minority can not make a report and ask consideration of the House upon it. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the majority of that committee desire to make a report, why, then, let them do it. If they do not desire to make a report at this time, let them wait until they can agree upon a report, or if they do not desire to do that, let them report this case to the House without action.

My friend from Iowa has asked that question. Let the committee report the case to the House, stating that it does not know who is entitled to the seat, and then let the House, as it must do at last, determine the matter. It does not follow that the House can not get control of an election case because the committee can not agree about it. The House can call up this case as one of highest privilege and pass upon it. The committee can report that they are unable to agree upon it, and let the House determine the question as to who is entitled to the seat. There is no fear that the House will be deprived of the right to pass upon this case. The House can have it.

But, Mr. Speaker, I submit that when six Republicans and three Democrats can not agree upon an election case that the House ought not to permit four men, who are in the minority, to come before the House and suggest their views, and to request that the House turn one man out and admit the other. It may be still, Mr. Speaker, that that shall be done now, but if it is done now, the rules established for the proper guidance of the House, for the proper report of committees, the rules establishing as to what constitutes the report of a committee, will be overriden, and it will be a precedent in after years, and a precedent that will bring harm to the orderly and legal method of making reports and considering them.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the views of the minority shall be filed at the same time that the report of the committee is filed; and if they are filed at any other time than at the time the majority files the report of the committee, it takes unanimous consent. I ask the Chair if that is not a correct statement?

Mr. LOUD. I would suggest to the gentleman, from the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana, it seems that we are likely to have this state of facts: The gentleman from Indiana says that the majority of this committee may yet agree—that they have not yet determined. Now, then, if that be the fact, Mr. Speaker, may we not ultimately find ourselves in the condition of the minority of a committee coming in here and making a report and asking that the majority of the committee may ultimately have the right to file the report?

Mr. BARTLETT. To file their views.

Mr. LOUD. Would it not be well for this committee to wait and determine what report it desires to present to this House in order to prevent some complications?

Mr. BARTLETT. I agree with the gentleman from California.

Mr. LOUD. I make that statement from the fact that the gentleman from Indiana says that they may yet agree upon a report.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thank the gentleman from California for the suggestion.

Mr. LOUD. It is an anomalous condition.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask the distinguished gentleman from California, who has had experience as to filing reports, if he ever heard of a report of a committee being offered not as a report of the committee, but filed by the minority?

Mr. LOUD. I can quite understand how a majority of the committee may direct a report to be made. Five members of a committee may agree on a certain state of facts and one, two, or three members may make one report, and one or two may present views of the committee, and I can understand how final action may be demanded. I can understand why a report may be presented to this House; but in this case the majority of the committee has not yet determined——

Mr. BARTLETT. That is right.

Mr. LOUD. As stated by the gentleman from Indiana; and they may to-morrow or the next day be prepared to present a report to this House in this case.

Mr. BARTLETT. I perfectly agree with the gentleman from California that if four were a majority of this committee and they had presented that report as the report of the committee only signed by four, where a committee is composed of nine, of which five would constitute a majority, and if the majority has not agreed as to what shall be the report of the committee to the House, that it is unheard of, and it is a violation of the rules of the House for the minority of the committee to make a report as the report of the committee.

I say, Mr. Speaker, to repeat, that the minority views of four members of a committee of nine can not be received and printed except at the time the majority report is received, unless by unanimous consent. I say it is unusual and an unheard-of thing for a committee to make a report when it is shown on its face that it is a minority report and the majority report has not been filed.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. The gentleman does not understand it. This is not offered as a report of the committee. It is so stated in the caption of the report. It is filed as the report of members who agree, and is the report of their views, filed by the direction of the committee—a unanimous direction of the committee.

Mr. BARTLETT. I say the minority has no right to file their views as a report of anything. Under the rules it can not be accepted as the views of the minority of the committee, nor as a report of the committee or any portion of it. I submit further that it can not be done except by unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. LACEY. Six of the committee constitute a quorum.

Mr. BARTLETT. Five constitute a quorum.

Mr. LACEY. Yes; five constitute a quorum. Now, if four of a quorum make a report, that is the report of the committee. The fact that the other gentlemen who were not present desire further time to file their report would not invalidate the report, would it?

Mr. BARTLETT. Not at all; but we have here the statement that this is not the views of six, but the views of four of the committee.

Mr. LACEY. Well, four is a majority of six.

Mr. SETTLE. Suppose it should eventuate that there were two views of four of the committee and another of one member. Do you mean to insist that none of them could be filed without unanimous consent?

Mr. BARTLETT. I say that the views of the minority of the committee can not be filed by that minority.

Mr. SETTLE. If there is no majority, then the committee could never file a report except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes, we can.

Mr. BAIRD. The House by a vote could relieve the committee of consideration of the case.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; the House could take charge of the case. Suppose there are the views of four, the views of three, and the views of two, and they all come to the House and state that they are not able to agree, the House can take charge of it and adopt the views of either one they see fit. The House has the power to do it, but under the rules the House has no right to accept the views of the minority of it, admitted to be the minority, against the views of five, a majority. The minority can not bring those views into the House and ask them to be printed and put upon the Calendar to be considered hereafter.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that four members assume to be the committee, and five members dissent.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; we have on the face of the report four men agreeing to it and saying that here are five that are not able to agree. I submit that until we have some report of the committee, these views of the minority, under the precedents that I have read to the House, can not be permitted to be filed.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, I take it there is no question that a majority of a committee can direct the chairman or any member to make a report upon any subject submitted to it. In the first session of the Thirty-seventh Congress, a session more important than any other session of Congress ever held, its Judiciary Committee never made a report, if I recollect aright, on a measure before them that a majority of the committee signed. The only way they got anything before the House was to direct the chairman to make a report, and he would report asking permission for the members of the committee, within a certain time, to file their views upon the question.

Now, there is no question that a majority can direct their chairman to make such a report. It is not a minority report on the subject-matter before them. The views would be the views of the minority if the majority do not agree, but the subject can be brought before the House by the direction of a majority of the committee, no matter how much they disagree, even if there were seven or nine different views on the question.

I call attention to the precedent that for two Congresses the Judiciary Committee of the House never did agree and a majority never signed any proposition that they reported to the House. It was new legislation. We were making new laws, and, as I have said a number of times, with my experience, if I had to make up a judiciary committee for legislation, there should not be more than three lawyers on it—just enough to give construction to adjudicated phrases by the courts, and the rest should be composed of good common-sense members. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, that Congress—the first session of the Thirty-seventh Congress—disposed of more legislation in twenty-seven days than was ever disposed of in any session of Congress since the Republic began. But the Judiciary Committee, selected from the most able lawyers of the House, from their reputation and by the positions they held at home, were not able to agree much of the time. The questions were new ones, like the confiscation of rebel property.

It was to carry on internecine war which we then had, for the first time, and its lawyers, able judges, coming from the highest courts of their States, in many cases, like lawyers in all cases, must adhere to precedent. They said no such thing was ever heard of as such and such proposed laws, and hence their disagreements. But they brought the business before the House, and the House disposed of it. There is no use of talking about a minority of the committee making a report. If, however, the majority agree on a report, no matter what the report is, the chairman, or a member instructed by a majority, is bound to bring it before the House; and there is no rule which would exclude it. The views of different members of the committee can all be filed, no matter if there are nine separate views on the question. [Applause.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, this report comes here by order of the Committee on Elections No. 3. It has the sanction of that committee, and for the purposes of the present question it is the report of the committee. It is a matter of no importance if even a majority of the committee might later file dissenting views. This report on its face assumes to be the views of four members of the committee, but when the committee orders it to be submitted to the House, it makes it conclusively the report of the committee. Whenever the majority of a committee instruct any member of that committee to submit a paper to the House from the committee as a report, it then becomes for all purposes the report of the committee; and a majority of the members are not precluded by that fact from joining afterward in dissenting views.

This committee has ordered this particular report to be submitted to the House. It is not the work simply of a minority. It is here by the order of the committee. It has the dignity and standing that belong to the report of a committee regularly submitted.

The committee instructs the member who presents the report to request time for the filing of the views of the other members. When those views are filed, the Speaker or the House will then determine, perhaps, any questions that may arise respecting the right to open and close the debate and other matters of that kind.

But for the present—for the purposes of the question as it now arises—I submit that the Speaker must take this document as the report of the committee. It is nothing else, because it is presented by the order of the committee. If a single member should declare his own individual views respecting the subject-matter before a committee and over which it properly had jurisdiction, and if the committee should instruct any one of its members to present that document as a report to the House, it would then become in effect the report of the committee and should be so treated for all purposes at all stages of its consideration. Such a proceeding gives the House jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and it might act efficiently upon it. Whatever papers may be presented subsequently under the request for unanimous consent will, I believe, occupy the position of the dissenting views of the members of the committee.

Mr. HAY. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether, when this report was agreed upon, or is said to have been agreed upon, all the members of the committee were present?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Seven out of nine were present, and one member who was absent has signed the report.

Mr. HAY. It strikes me that this is not so much a question of parliamentary law as a question of fact. Now, if a majority of the members of that committee who were then present and acting directed that this be presented as the report of the committee, they can make the report; but if this is not a report of the committee as then constituted, they can not do so.

The SPEAKER. Can not the committee act by those who are present?

Mr. HAY. Yes, sir; I presume.

Mr. BURKE rose.

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE. A majority of the members present in the committee room this morning did not concur in the report offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HAY. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. BURKE. There can be no question about that at all. The gentleman from Indiana knows it is true.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. They simply agreed that it should be filed as the views of the minority.

Mr. BURKE. That was all, sir. Furthermore, I see no impropriety in stating that it was the unanimous wish of the committee this morning that this report should simply be filed as presenting the views of those four gentlemen, not of the majority of the committee at all. It is preposterous to talk about four members being a majority of a committee when that committee is constituted of nine members.

The SPEAKER. Would not the committee be entitled to act by a majority of those present?

Mr. RICHARDSON. If there was a quorum present.

Mr. BURKE. But a majority of those present this morning did not concur in this report.

Mr. HAY. As I understand the facts in this case, this paper can not be filed as the report of the majority of the committee. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURKE] has stated—and it is not denied—that the paper now presented represents the action of a minority of the members who were present, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has stated that since that committee met this morning one of the four gentlemen whose names are attached to the report signed it—not while the committee was having its meeting, but since.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HAY. I understood the gentleman from Indiana to so state.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. The gentleman referred to signed the report two or three days ago—at a former meeting of the committee.

Mr. HAY. I understood the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] to state that one of the four members signed the report to-day.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Oh, no. It was signed by him some days ago.

Mr. HAY. Then one of the four gentlemen who signed the report was not present at the meeting of the committee this morning?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me state to the gentleman that one of the gentlemen was not present at the meeting this morning who signed the report. That is correct.

Mr. HAY. Then I understand that seven members were present, and four were opposed to this report—because one of the members who signed it was absent—and three only favored it. Now, if that is true, it can not be a report of the majority of the committee at all. The other report, if another report should come, may be a majority report.

Mr. STEELE. But this was a report made by order of the committee. It was directed by them.

Mr. HAY. Oh, no; they simply authorized it to be presented.

Mr. STEELE. They directed it to be done.

Mr. HAY. I understand not.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. The gentleman is mistaken. Let us have a clear understanding of the matter. This was ordered to be reported by the committee.

Mr. HAY. That is as the views of the four members. Not as the views of the committee.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Only as the views of the minority of the committee—those signing it.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. The gentleman is mistaken in that. Now, my colleague from Virginia is talking of something that possibly I understand better than he does. Allow me to make this statement of my idea, which I think will make it clear to him. This report was submitted on motion of one of the members of the committee who did not sign the report at all, and it was unanimously the order of the committee that this should be submitted, as signed by the four members, and the other members should have ten days in which to file their views.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. But it was filed simply as the views of the four members.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Not at all. I do not so understand it.

Mr. LOUD. Why, of course. The four members could not make a report for the committee. It is simply a submission of their views.

Mr. HAY. The point I make has nothing to do with what passed in committee to-day, except that this is not the report of the committee at all. It is simply a leave by the committee to file the views of the minority.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman take the position that the committee might not report to the House the views of the various members of the committee—the individual views?

Mr. HAY. I do not, Mr. Speaker. But I say that that would not be the report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. It would not be the report of the committee recommending action, it is true; but for all that it might be the report of the committee.

Mr. HAY. Yes, of course; as filing the views of the minority.

The SPEAKER. As representing the views of all who assented to such a report.

Mr. HAY. Certainly; but it could be presented, I presume, Mr. Speaker, as the views only of those signing it.

The SPEAKER. It is not a report of the committee for action. It does not recommend action; but this report to the House of the four members—submitted as per manuscript—is a presentation of their views; and the other five members who may desire to express theirs ask unanimous consent that ten days be allowed them from this time for that purpose.

Mr. HAY. That is precisely the point, Mr. Speaker; and the Chair has stated what I was trying to state so much better than I could do that I am willing to submit the matter there.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the committee report can be received and unanimous consent given for ten days to submit the views of the other members of the committee.

Mr. BARTLETT. Do I understand that the Chair has ruled upon this question?

The SPEAKER. Only a suggestion that inasmuch as the committee make the report of the opinions of some of its members, time be allowed for other members to submit their views also.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand the Chair to suggest that the proper way and the only way in which this can be done is that the minority of the committee can present their views now and the other members can present theirs only by unanimous consent, unless filed at the time the views of the committee are filed; in other words, that it takes unanimous consent now for the paper presented by the four members to be filed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is not quite so clear a question. The committee are supposed to understand the rule, and if they propose to make a report unconditionally as to the opinion of four of their members, and then ask unanimous consent that the others may present their views, why, they must take their chance of the House granting it, and it may not interfere with their right to make a report of the views of four of their number. Still the Chair would rather this question would be settled by unanimous consent, because that will save any question of precedent in the matter.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not wish to take the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] off the floor, but from what has been said it seems to me——

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Just for a moment—it seems to me there is no difficulty in reaching a unanimous-consent agreement. The facts all appear from what has been said, namely, that the committee agreed this morning that there might be a report to the House, not a formal report of the committee, but a report made to the House of certain facts, and those facts are that certain members of that committee agreed to certain conclusions, which are set forth in this paper; and at the same time they report that there are five other members of the committee who do not agree to the conclusions which they have reached. Now, I submit that if the paper which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] purposes submitting sets out the facts in that way, there ought to be no objection to unanimous consent; but if the paper on its face assumes to be the report of this committee, then there would be objection to the unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it is only a report of the committee sub modo.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Just setting forth the facts as they appear; there can be no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have here the reporter's notes showing the statement of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman read it?

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] made this statement:

Mr. Speaker, by order of the Committee on Elections No. 3, I submit the report signed by four members of that committee, and ask that it be printed and that the dissenting members have until ten days from now to file their report or views. This report refers to the case of Brown vs. Swanson.

Mr. BABCOCK. That states the facts.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The remarks which have been made indicate exactly what the agreement is, namely, that four gentlemen have been ordered by the committee to submit their findings in this case, reserving the right to the other five gentlemen to submit their findings in the case. Now, if these gentlemen agree to that——

Mr. COX. But that purports to be a report of the committee.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; it does not purport to be that. I understand the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] to say it is not the report of the committee in this case, except as explained.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, a word on this question. I submit that for the purposes of this case it must be considered as the report of the committee. Let me illustrate. Suppose now that the majority could not agree upon any report, and suppose four members of the committee should favor the seating of the contestant, that three members should favor the seating of the contestee, and two members should favor the unseating of both parties to the contest. The committee then could agree upon no report. Under that state of facts it would be entirely proper for the committee to request any set of its members to present their views to the House, and that report should stand as the report of the committee for all practical purposes, and then the other five or the other seven could file their dissenting views, all together if they could unite, or separately if they could not unite.

It could not affect the merits of the case, but it would give the House jurisdiction of the subject and give somebody control of the matter in order that it might be called up and submitted. That would be the only purpose of it. I say it is not irregular or anomalous for the committee to order a report, even where only a minority concur in it. But now this report on its face purports to express the views of only four members, and it assumes or contemplates that the other five may dissent. They may unite in their dissension, or they may file separate dissenting views. It occurs to me that this is entirely regular, particularly since it is ordered by the unanimous vote of the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, in reply to what the gentleman says, there would be no difficulty in what the gentleman suggests, there being seven members of the committee present this morning, if four of them had united in this report. There being a quorum present, there would be no difficulty if four of those present had ordered a report to be made——

Mr. BARTLETT. But I understand the statement was made upon the floor of the House by a member of the committee that only three of those present agreed to this.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am coming to that. There was no such agreement, however, as I was about to remark. There were seven present, and four of them did not unite in this report, and therefore it is not the report of the committee, except in the qualified sense which has been explained; and that is that they all agreed that they might submit to the House this statement in writing, showing the views of four members of the committee, three of whom were then present and one of whom was not present. Now, there should be no trouble about this; that they report the views of these four, it being understood that the other five shall be entitled to file their views.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is, a joint report of the committee, if they so desire.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think there would be some difficulty about submitting a report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that the committee be allowed to present the opinion of four of its members, and that the rest of the members be allowed—how much time?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Ten days.

The SPEAKER. Ten days to present their opinion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And if all agree in their opinions, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is contending that that would be a report of the committee. That would be a material point.

The SPEAKER. It is not a report of the committee, but four members express their views—express their own views.

Mr. BARTLETT. Exactly. I am not going to object to the suggestion of the Chair. I think it is a very wise solution of this question; and, so far as I am concerned, I shall content myself with having made the point and with having cited, as I did hastily and on the spur of the moment, the precedents in the case. I ask to be permitted to incorporate in the remarks that I shall make upon this point the citation from the Journal of the first session of the Twenty-fourth Congress, page 561; also from the Congressional Globe of July 10, 1850, page 85, and the references to the Manual under which I take the position that the minority, composed of these four gentlemen, are now coming up and asking as a matter of privilege to file their views as the report of the committee, as it is only the committee which has the privilege to make a report at any time.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. The committee directed this to be reported, and therefore it is the privilege of the committee and the privilege of the whole committee that is involved.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the other gentlemen will be allowed ten days in which to prepare their views. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The matter referred to by Mr. BARTLETT is as follows:

[First session, Twenty-fourth Congress, Journal, page 561.]

On March 25, 1836, Mr. Hall (Vermont), a member of the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads, to which was referred so much of the message of the President of the United States, at the commencement of the session, as relates "to the report of the Postmaster-General, the condition and operation of the Post-Office Department, and everything connected therewith," offered to submit to the House a paper, in the form of a report, which, he stated, contained the views of the minority of the committee on that part of the said message which suggests "propriety of passing such a law as will prohibit, under severe penalties, the circulation, in the Southern States, through the mail, of incendiary publications, intended to instigate the slaves to insurrection."

The Speaker decided that when reports of the committee are called for a report can not be made from a minority of a committee, as a minority is not a committee; that the paper offered was not a report authorized to be made to the House by authority of the committee and could not be received as a report from the minority; and that, consequently, it was not in order to offer the same.

The Globe (page 281) does not give any further light.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the resolutions reported by that portion of the committee to which I belong. If I understand the matter correctly, the report of a minority of a committee which concludes with resolutions, being in effect a recommendation that the resolutions be adopted, is a motion to amend the resolutions of the majority. That, I apprehend, is the principle very well established by parliamentary law; and I submit that the resolutions reported by that portion of the committee with whom I had the honor to act come up of themselves as an amendment to the resolutions of the majority.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not concur with the gentleman from Ohio in this position. The parliamentary law, as he understands it, does not recognize the report of a minority of a committee as a report. It contains the views of the minority, and whenever they report resolutions or a bill they are not before the House for its action until they are submitted by some member, either of that minority or by some other member. The report of the minority of itself does not bring the question before the House for its action. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Ohio that, so far as he is informed, such has been the uniform practice of the House. Whatever may be the practice of other parliamentary bodies the Chair is not prepared to say.

Authority to make a motion in behalf of a committee must be given by the committee. It is not sufficient that members of the committee have individually consented.

All reports of committees, except as provided in clause 57 of Rule XI, together with the views of the minority, shall be delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper Calendar, under the direction of the Speaker, in accordance with the foregoing clause, and the titles or subjects thereof shall be entered on the Journal and printed in the RECORD.—Rule XIII, clause 2.

A minority can not make a report.

When a report is presented by a committee, a minority may be permitted to present their views, which is usually allowed as a matter of course.

A minority can not originate or report a bill or other proposition, and when the committee in their report do not recommend any legislative proposition, it is not in order to place on the Calendar a proposition recommended by a minority. (See Journals, 1, 24, page 561; 1, 47, page 1709; Globes, 2, 27, page 248; 1, 31, page 1345; 2, 41, page 954.)

SANITARIUM AND BATH HOUSE ON GOVERNMENT RESERVATION AT HOT SPRINGS, ARK.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6468) authorizing the Supreme Lodge of the Knights of Pythias to erect and maintain a sanitarium and bath house on the Government reservation at the city of Hot Springs, Ark.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the exclusive right to use, occupy, and enjoy the possession of the following-described lot of land, being a part of the Government reservation at the city of Hot Springs, Ark., to wit, commencing on the north line of Reserve avenue at the southeast corner of the Army and Navy Hospital grounds; thence running eastward along the north line of Reserve avenue 405 feet, more or less, to United States monument No. 27; thence north 6½° west 470 feet; thence west on a direct line 453 feet, more or less, to the northeast corner of the Army and Navy Hospital grounds; thence southward along the east boundary of said Army and Navy Hospital grounds 525 feet to place of beginning, is by this act granted to the Supreme Lodge of the Knights of Pythias for the purpose of erecting, equipping, and maintaining a national sanitarium and bath house for the accommodation of the Knights of Pythias of the United States of America. The rights and privileges granted under this act shall continue as long as the property is used and occupied for the purposes mentioned in this act, subject, however, to the following conditions and limitations, namely: That unless said supreme lodge shall, within ten years after the passage of this act, erect and equip a sanitarium and bath house for the purposes above mentioned, at a cost of not less than $250,000, or if said supreme lodge shall at any time hereafter use or permit said premises to be used for any other purpose than that herein granted, then, and in either event, all the rights, privileges, and powers by this act granted and conferred upon said supreme lodge shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 2. That upon compliance with the conditions and requirements of section 1 of this act by said supreme lodge, the Secretary of the Interior shall be authorized and required to lease to said supreme lodge a sufficient quantity of hot water to accommodate said sanitarium for all drinking purposes and to supply at least five bath tubs, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe; and all improvements made upon said property shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to know, as there have been several of these grants, if there is land enough there?

Mr. LITTLE. There is abundant territory. There is no trouble about the land.

Mr. LOUD. We have been making these grants for a number of years, and I did not know whether there was land enough left there. One other question. I will ask the gentleman if he does not regard the period of ten years as a rather long time for the completion of this work?

Mr. LITTLE. It was suggested that that was a long time, and I would have no serious objection to reducing the amount of time. My understanding is that they propose to enter upon the construction of this institution at an early day.

And, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the order of the Knights of Pythias is one of the noblest and grandest institutions in this country—benevolent and social in its purposes; and its membership are inspired by the noblest sentiments of fraternal love in undertaking this noble work. And if this permission is given it will, as I believe, establish, erect, and maintain an institution that will add new luster to its already glorious record in its efforts to better the condition of its membership and mankind.

The purpose of the bill is to enable the Knights of Pythias of the United States to erect and maintain a sanitarium and bath house upon the permanent reservation at Hot Springs, Ark., for the use and benefit of the sick and afflicted of its membership and their families, at a cost of not less than $250,000. This order was organized in the city of Washington in the year 1864 with 78 members, and it now numbers more than 500,000. It has a uniform rank of about 50,000, and carries insurance in favor of its membership of more than $90,000,000. It is a social, fraternal, and benevolent institution, and asks this privilege for the benefit of the poor and afflicted of its large membership, extending, as it does, into almost every county in the United States.

The passage of this bill is urged by the supreme lodge of the United States to enable it to erect and maintain such an institution as will be an honor to the Government and a credit to the order, and a blessing to the poor and afflicted having claims upon its benevolence.

Your committee find that the granting of this privilege at the point upon the reservation described in the bill will in no wise interfere with the present or contemplated improvements by the Government, or with its control of the hot waters, and that upon the large reservation under the control of the Government there is ample room for any improvements that the Government may desire to make or permit to be made in the future.

All improvements permitted by the bill can only be made with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and all the rights and privileges granted under the bill become forfeited if the grant is used for any other purpose than that permitted by the bill; and your committee believe that, with these strict limitations, no harm can come from the passage of the bill, but that, on the contrary, much good will result both to this order and to the Government. It will give an opportunity to the large membership of this order to secure the benefits of the curative properties of the hot waters of these famous springs, which are owned and controlled by the Government; add greatly to the value of the property owned by the Government, and utilize a portion of the hot waters that now go to waste, and create a revenue to the Government therefrom.

Mr. LOUD. Do you not think it would be well to limit it to five years?

Mr. LITTLE. Say six years, and I will agree to it.

Mr. LOUD. I suggest that amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. I agree to the amendment offered, to limit the time to six years.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman state how much area there is in these mountains proposed to be utilized in this way?

Mr. LITTLE. There are several thousand acres of land.

Mr. SHAFROTH. How much of it has been granted?

Mr. LITTLE. No amount has ever been granted for this purpose except along the main avenue.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Which comprises about how many acres?

Mr. LITTLE. About 2,400 acres.

Mr. LOUD. I should think it was 10,000,000 or 15,000,000 by the number of times the gentleman has been coming up here.

Mr. LITTLE. Well, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] suggests that the time be limited to five years, and I am willing to agree to that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 26, page 2, the word "ten" and insert the word "five."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

NEW BEDFORD HARBOR, MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that after consultation with the gentlemen on the other side and removing their objections, I now ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate bill 4127.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 4127, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $34,122 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to dredge the channel in the harbor of New Bedford, Mass., leading to the bridge between that city and Fairhaven.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say——

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I would like some explanation of this bill.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to give the explanation if I can have silence.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will please be in order.

Mr. BARRETT. For the third time this morning, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill. In the cases where objection was made before, on a full statement of facts the gentlemen were satisfied to withdraw their objections.

A drawbridge has for one hundred years existed over the Acushnet River, in New Bedford, a river upon which there is considerable commerce. In 1893 the legislature of Massachusetts directed a new bridge should be built at that point. The War Department interfered and directed that the draw in the new bridge should be 900 feet to the east of where the old draw was located. The county of Bristol has built it according to the directions of the War Department; but where the new draw is ordered to be located there is less water and a more shoal channel than where the old draw existed. In order to make the new channel as deep as the one ordered to be closed, an appropriation of $34,000 is necessary.

The county has built the bridge, and more than $500,000 has been spent. The time for its completion is at an end, and the Government has not dredged out the river at the point where the new draw is built. Until that dredging is done the new bridge can not be completed, and the people of that county having spent a half a million dollars, of which $200,000 is extra on account of the order of the War Department, it now asks that the Government give them as good a channel as they had before the old one was closed up by the direction of the Government. This appropriation merely gives the same depth of channel that they always had, and puts this one in the place of the one that the War Department ordered closed up when the new draw was built.

I want the House to understand that the draw never would have been changed except by the order of the War Department, because being removed from where the old one existed the county has been put to the expense of $200,000. The materials for finishing the bridge are all there, the machinery is all in place, but the thing can not be carried out until this channel is dredged out, so that the commerce which frequents that river can find its way to the new draw, and in that way pass up to the great industries which are established above.

Mr. LOUD. Why can not the bridge be completed now?

Mr. BARRETT. Because to complete the bridge necessitates filling up the old channel where the old draw was; and inasmuch as the new draw already finished can not be reached because the Government has not dredged out the channel, you are leaving a great number of large establishments, using thousands of tons of coal every year, without the opportunity to have their material brought to them that has always been brought there since the beginning of things. The Government has taken away that which we have always possessed, and we simply ask the Government to give back the depth of water which it has deprived us of.

Mr. LOUD. How has the Government taken away the depth of water?

Mr. BARRETT. Because they have ordered the draw to be put in a new place, where there is less depth of water than there was in the old channel.

Mr. LOUD. Was not that a very strange transaction?

Mr. BARRETT. It was one of the strangest transactions that ever took place.

Mr. LOUD. Can you not fix it by going to the War Department?

Mr. BARRETT. No. Every member of the committee of the House and every member of the committee of the Senate, both Republicans and Democrats, tried it; and every member of the Senate and every member of this House, when the facts are fully understood, will agree that this remedy should be extended.

Mr. LOUD. Could not we direct the War Department to place the draw where there is plenty of water?

Mr. BARRETT. The county has already expended $200,000 under this order as it is.

Mr. LOUD. You say that if the draw were put in the proper place you would not have to do any dredging. It is a very strange transaction that the War Department should insist on the construction of a new draw in a place where there is not sufficient water and the removal of an old draw from a point where there is plenty of water.

Mr. BARRETT. The War Department took the plans for this bridge (which must be approved by that Department before the bridge can be constructed) and ordered that the work should not be proceeded with until the draw had been located in the new place. Under those orders the county of Bristol proceeded in good faith to construct this draw. And now they ask the Government to carry into effect its side of the transaction—to give them the water to float their vessels up past this bridge, as has always been done.

Mr. LOUD. I must insist again that this is one of the most peculiar conditions that I have ever seen presented. The gentleman from Massachusetts says to this House that if the War Department would permit the construction of this draw where there is plenty of water, this expenditure of money would not be necessary. But the War Department, according to the gentleman's statement, is insisting upon the placing of a draw where there is no water, when it could just as well insist upon the construction of a draw where there is plenty of water, and thus save an expenditure of $34,000. It is certainly a peculiar case.

Mr. BARRETT. I will say to the gentleman that the War Department may have its own reasons for the action it has taken. I think one reason is that by locating the draw as it has decided it should be located a straighter channel can be obtained. The county of Bristol had nothing to do with that. The action of that county was interfered with by the order of the War Department. The county acted in accordance with the order; and it now asks that this navigable stream, over which a drawbridge has existed for more than a century, be so opened that commerce may go up there as it has always done heretofore, delivering the necessary materials of those great manufacturing establishments at their wharves.

Mr. LOUD. Has the War Department been corresponded with on this question, and has it submitted anything in writing to the committee?

Mr. BARRETT. Why, Mr. Speaker, we have all the correspondence with the Department; we have the report of the local engineer to the War Department; we have the order of the Department to the county of Bristol instructing them to build this bridge as it has been built. The bridge is constructed; it is there; the draw is there. Now all that the people want is a channel leading up to the draw so that vessels may pass through and back as they always have done.

Mr. LOUD. Would it not be well to get from the War Department some expression of its views as to why it will not permit the construction of this draw where there is plenty of water, when it could just as well be done as not?

Mr. BARRETT. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I think there is some misapprehension here.

Mr. LOUD. I think there is, too. There can be no doubt about that. I can not believe that the condition exists as the gentleman from Massachusetts has presented it. If it does, then the War Department should be severely censured for its course.

Mr. BURTON. The War Department is not deserving of censure. The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] will concede that there may be a choice between two channels——

Mr. LOUD. Oh, yes.

Mr. BURTON. That although one channel has been used, another may be better. There is a certain amount of expense necessary for maintaining the present channel. The channel in the other place would be not only deeper, but more convenient and more easily maintained. The situation is clear enough from the standpoint of the people of New Bedford. They are forced to make this change. And I think I express the unanimous sentiment of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors when I say that this measure is of exceptional merit and ought to pass. There is precedent for it. A little over a year ago the House voted $250,000 by unanimous consent for the repair of a crevasse in the South East Pass of the Mississippi.

Mr. LOUD. Right there. In regard to this "unanimous sentiment" of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, is it not generally extended by the members of that committee to help one another out on any proposition that any member may want? [Laughter.]

Mr. BURTON. I do not know that that is the case. We endeavor to consider fairly all the propositions brought before us. We hear the reports of the War Department and the Engineer Department. We must take their judgment in matters of engineering.

Mr. LOUD. What is the commerce of this stream?

Mr. BURTON. I am not informed as to that; but I understand that it is very considerable. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] can answer more definitely as to that.

Mr. BARRETT. I can answer that question, but not officially, because all the commerce is rated as belonging to the port of New Bedford, which lies both above and below the bridge. But there are a great many very large manufacturing establishments on this stream above the bridge which consume thousands of tons of coal and large quantities of other products, which are all brought by water and carried through this bridge to their wharves.

Mr. LOUD. I do not think I shall object to this bill, but I wish to make one suggestion. The House, I think, is now brought to the condition which necessarily results from the resolution of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to bring before this body at the present session no river and harbor bill. The Speaker and the House well know that prior to this year no man ever had the boldness to come before this House and ask by unanimous consent to get an order for a survey for work on a river or harbor.

That work heretofore has been included in the river and harbor bill; but this year the committee have reported bill after bill for the survey of new work in order that it may bring that work in such a position that it can go into the river and harbor bill quicker than if compelled to take its regular course.

Six years, Mr. Speaker, I have been pleading and working along in my humble way in this House to have some work done in the great harbor of San Francisco. I have pursued a proper and legitimate course, going to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and getting the matter in proper shape and in legitimate form; getting through that committee the right for a preliminary examination, which took two years; going again and getting a survey, which takes two years more, and now, when this work has been reported favorably and is ready to be done—for a harbor which never yet had any money from this Government—the River and Harbor Committee decide that they will bring in no river and harbor bill; and yet, I repeat, day after day the members of that committee come before the House and ask us to grant such privileges as they will not give to any other members.

Now, having said that much, I will be content to let the House deal with this matter as it pleases, and let it go through if it so desires.

Mr. BURTON. Let me state to the gentleman that he seems to be laboring under a misapprehension in reference to this matter also. This harbor is not in the district of any member of the River and Harbor Committee. It is in Massachusetts, it is true, but in the district represented by the late Representative Simpkins.

Mr. LOUD. That is all very true, but it is presented by a gentleman who is much interested in the State of Massachusetts. And let me say to the gentleman that there may be things in California not directly in my district in which I am just as much interested as a member who represents the district in which the work is progressing. Do not let us quibble about a trifle like that. I know the condition of things in many parts of the country with reference to this river and harbor work, and I know that in some of them many districts are directly interested.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I certainly hope that there will be no objection on this side of the House to the unanimous consent asked for by my colleague from Massachusetts to the consideration of this proposition. I do not know that I can add anything to the forcible and clear statement of my colleague from Massachusetts that will influence the action of the House in dealing with this matter; but let me say for the information of those who may not have heard his statement that the county commissioners of Massachusetts have been put to an expense of more than $250,000 in the relocation of the bridge to which my colleague has referred, under orders of the War Department. If any river and harbor bill had been reported this year, this measure would certainly have received the unanimous indorsement of the committee, and there would have been no necessity for asking unanimous consent now for its consideration.

The county commissioners of the county in which this bridge is located have gone to great expense under orders of the War Department, and it is only fair that this House should deal fairly with them and appropriate the amount called for by this bill. The commerce and industry of the large manufacturing city of New Bedford will be greatly injured if this improvement is not made, and I hope this House will do justice in this matter and vote for that appropriation.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to ask my friend from Massachusetts what is the commerce now on that river?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I should judge it would amount to a million of dollars annually, more or less.

Mr. CANNON. That may be. But what is the tonnage? Now, the report of the engineers should show the tonnage; what is it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will allow me, I should say that the city of New Bedford is about the largest cotton manufacturing city in this country; that thousands upon thousands of tons of coal must go up the river annually to that great city, as well as thousands of bales of cotton. I will state further that the United States Government decreed that this improvement must be made, and it is in a position to-day to stop the industry and the manufacturing prosperity of this great city by not complying with its manifest obligations.

Mr. CANNON. How many railroads center there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. One or two.

Mr. CANNON. How far is it from Boston?

Mr. FITZGERALD. About 50 or 60 miles.

Mr. CANNON. Well, does all the freight that goes there go up and down the river?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman knows, of course, that it is very much cheaper to ship by water than by land.

Mr. CANNON. Of course; I understand that. But I am asking the gentleman the question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that a great deal of the freight goes by water.

Mr. CANNON. And is required to pass the draw of this bridge?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. How long has it been since this channel has been established—the new channel?

Mr. FITZGERALD. My colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT], of the River and Harbor Committee, can answer that question much better than I. I merely rose to appeal to my Democratic colleagues, knowing that the county commission in Massachusetts had spent large sums of money by order of the War Department, and I felt that the National Government should do its share.

Mr. CANNON. I thought the gentleman had full information on the subject.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I gave the information as far as I could. My colleague will answer the gentleman's question further, as he is on the committee and can give full particulars.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman was so zealous about it that I supposed he had knowledge of the tonnage.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am giving information to the best of my knowledge, and if any further information is desired my colleague [Mr. BARRETT], who is on the River and Harbor Committee, will be very glad to inform the gentleman from Illinois. The question of the exact tonnage is immaterial. The gentleman from Illinois knows full well that New Bedford is a large manufacturing city, and that its commerce will be very much injured, and unjustly so, if this bill is not passed.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that consent is granted for the consideration of the bill?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHUFORD. I object.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] if he can tell me what the tonnage is to New Bedford up this river?

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

W. H. BARNARD AND ROBERT THOMAS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3391) for the relief of W. H. Barnard and Robert Thomas.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $123.47 to W. H. Barnard and Robert Thomas, for money collected from them inadvertently by the United States marshal for the northern district of Alabama as sureties on an appearance bond of one John Reynolds, which bond was forfeited, but said forfeiture being afterwards set aside.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

HILLSBORO BAY, FLORIDA.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 149, directing the Secretary of War to submit plans and estimates for the proposed improvement of Hillsboro Bay, Florida, from its confluence with Tampa Bay, through Hillsboro Bay and River, to the city of Tampa.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to submit plans and estimates for the improvement of Hillsboro Bay, Florida, from its confluence with Tampa Bay, through Hillsboro Bay and River, to the city of Tampa, to carry out the recommendations of the engineers of the War Department already made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. LOUD. I think you ought to have the regular proviso on there which is on every bill.

Mr. SPARKMAN. What proviso is that?

Mr. LOUD. I can not remember the wording of it.

Mr. DOCKERY. It is the usual provision calling on the Secretary of War for his opinion as to the advisability of the work.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That has already been had.

Mr. LOUD. There is no objection to having it again, if you have had it once.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I can explain this matter. The last river and harbor bill provided for a preliminary survey and a report as to the advisability of this work. This report was had, or rather it had been had many years before, and a report was made on this old survey. The report was favorable to the project, and the Government was advised that it was a proper measure for the Government to undertake. I understand from the Chief of Engineers that he has already the necessary data for making a final report, and that it will not be necessary hereafter to make any new survey. So that the report we are calling for here now will need no appropriation and no expenditure of even a dollar to have it made to this body. Inasmuch as it will entail no additional expense, and inasmuch as the Chief of Engineers has the data which will enable him to make the report, I hope that there will be no objection to the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman if he does not think it would be much more advisable to instruct the River and Harbor Committee to bring so much of a river and harbor bill as will permit surveys or as relates to surveys?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LOUD. Day after day the River and Harbor Committee are reporting to this Congress resolutions which are expediting river and harbor work from two to four years.

Mr. SPARKMAN. So far as I am concerned, I should have no objection to the River and Harbor Committee reporting all of them which are deserving of report.

Mr. LOUD. I shall insist that the gentleman put the usual proviso on his resolution. If an opinion has been given already upon the advisability of this work it can not do any harm to get it again. It has been placed upon every resolution that has passed so far.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think the gentleman is mistaken, for I am sure this resolution is similar to those resolutions.

Mr. LOUD. The River and Harbor Committee have reported every resolution in that shape. I am willing to admit that, but I do not think one of them has passed this House without the proviso being added, and this one shall not pass this House, if it requires unanimous consent, unless it is added.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the gentleman state what his proviso is.

Mr. LOUD. The Clerk can state it. It is the usual proviso which is added to every similar resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the proviso desired by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of line 8 the words:

"And that the Secretary of War be requested to report to Congress whether or not it is advisable for the Government to undertake such improvement."

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have no objection to that. I accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SPARKMAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JOHN R. HALL.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1287) for the relief of Dr. John R. Hall, of Louisville, Ky.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to pay, and for that purpose there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $80 to Dr. John R. Hall, of Louisville, Ky., in full payment and satisfaction of his account against the United States for special medical services rendered to soldiers of the United States at Georgetown, Ky., during the late war, at the request of the officer in command at that time and place.

Mr. DOCKERY. It seems to me that we ought to have the report read on that claim for medical services.

Mr. STURTEVANT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear the report of that bill read.

The report (by Mr. WEAVER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1287) for the relief of Dr. John R. Hall, submit the following report:

This is a claim for medical services rendered United States troops stationed at Georgetown, Ky., during the year 1864. Claim stated at $80.

The proof shows that at the time claimant rendered said services the officer in command at Georgetown gave him the proper vouchers and certificates, showing that said services had been rendered; that claimant sent said vouchers to the War Department for settlement and the same were returned to him by said Department with directions and instructions that the same be sent to the medical director at Memphis, Tenn., for his indorsement and approval; that in obedience to said instructions from the War Department, the claimant mailed at Georgetown, Ky., said vouchers, together with the letter and instructions received from said Department, and directed to the medical director at Memphis, Tenn. No reply was received nor were said vouchers ever returned to him.

Claimant filed his claim in the Surgeon-General's Office. The Surgeon-General referred the case to the Second Auditor of the Treasury Department with the following indorsement:

"Respectfully forwarded to the Second Auditor for the action of the accounting officers of the Treasury, with the information that a careful search of the records fails to furnish any information in this case, except that inquiry was made in May, 1869, and no record was then found. The vouchers which the claimant alleges were furnished to him by the officers in command of the troops to whom the services were rendered were never received at this office. One of the witnesses, S. F. Gano, M. D., was surgeon of the board of enrollment, seventh district of Kentucky, from May 8, 1863, to June 15, 1865, when he was honorably discharged. His signatures are undoubtedly genuine, and his testimony is entitled to full credence.

"It is believed that the claimant rendered service for which he should have been paid, but the evidence is not regarded as sufficiently definite as to the extent of the services rendered and the troops attended to warrant a recommendation for the allowance of a fixed amount. Approval is therefore withheld. If, however, the evidence adduced by the claimant and obtained from official sources shall be regarded by the accounting officers as sufficient to warrant payment of the claim, no objection is made by this office, and such amount as may be found due would, it is presumed, be properly chargeable to the appropriation 'medical and hospital, 1883 and prior years.'

"By order of the Surgeon-General:

"J. H. BAXTER,

"Chief Medical Purveyor, United States Army."

The claim was disallowed by the accounting officers after admitting that the services were rendered.

Your committee hold that the claimant should be paid, that the original vouchers were lost or mislaid through no fault of Dr. Hall, and report the bill back and recommend its passage.

The committee attach to their report information relating to claims of contract surgeons and claims for medical services, medical and hospital supplies, and care of wounded and sick soldiers, and ask that it be printed as an appendix to the report.

APPENDIX.

CONTRACT SURGEONS.

It can not be ascertained that any specific law upon the subject ever warranted the appointment of contract or acting assistant surgeons; their employment and compensation were provided for from time to time in the annual appropriation bills passed by Congress, allowing a gross amount to be expended for such purpose, and usually specifying or restricting their number.

Monthly compensation ranged from $100 to $113.83; $100 for hospital service and $113.83 for field service; and $25 per month in addition where they furnished medicines. The Surgeon-General has exercised the right to fix the pay, both generally and in specific cases, and although particular law and regulation can not be quoted therefor, this action has been uniformly acquiesced in by the Secretary of War and the accounting officers of the Treasury for many years. The right to fix the pay of acting assistant surgeons was finally formally vested in the Surgeon-General by the Secretary of War November 17, 1880.

None have been employed since July 16, 1892, Congress having declined to make any appropriation for their payment after that date.

Notes of decisions by Supreme Court of the United States.

A contract surgeon in the Army is not an officer, and an officer is not to be credited with such service in the computation of his longevity pay (James C. Byrnes vs. The United States, 26 C. Cls. R., page 302).

CLAIMS FOR MEDICAL SERVICES, MEDICAL AND HOSPITAL SUPPLIES, AND CARE OF SICK AND WOUNDED SOLDIERS.

The authority for filing these claims rests on the fact that Congress annually makes an appropriation for the purchase of medical and hospital supplies and for the medical care and treatment of officers and enlisted men on duty at posts and stations for which no other provision is made, and on the further fact that the time for presenting such claims is not barred by any statute of limitations.

Claims of this character come under the jurisdiction of the Auditor for the War Department.

Mr. STURTEVANT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear some explanation of that bill. I would like to know what committee reported it.

Mr. DOCKERY. And when reported.

The SPEAKER. It is reported by the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. STURTEVANT. What is the date of the report?

The SPEAKER. January 25.

Mr. LOUD. What year?

Mr. EVANS. This is a very poor and needy old man, living in the city of Louisville, who has had this claim for the small sum of $80 pending for a number of years. He was a contract surgeon at Georgetown, Ky., during the war, and rendered this service, as proved by the vouchers given to him for it at the time of the war, but which have been lost in transmission to the proper Department here. That is the whole claim. It is just $80. The man needs the money.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CHATTANOOGA RAPID TRANSIT COMPANY.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5511) granting to the Chattanooga Rapid Transit Company the right to cross with its track the Dry Valley road to the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, at his discretion, upon the favorable recommendation of the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park Commission, to grant a right of way to the Chattanooga Rapid Transit Company to lay a single track across the Dry Valley road; and such other concessions as may be necessary to permit the said Chattanooga Rapid Transit Company to extend its lines to the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, at his discretion, and upon the favorable recommendation of the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park Commission, to grant a right of way to the Chattanooga Rapid Transit Company to lay a single track across the Dry Valley road at such point or place thereon as said commission may determine upon; and also, upon like recommendation of said commission, may grant such other concessions as may be necessary to permit the said Chattanooga Rapid Transit Company to extend its lines to the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park: Provided, That such grant or grants shall only become or be operative on the condition that the track and tracks and roadbed of said company, and the right of way for any and all extensions of its road to said park from the point of crossing said Dry Valley road shall first be definitely fixed and located upon a line or lines which shall be satisfactory to and approved by said commission; and no part of said line or lines of road, after being so located, established, built, or constructed, shall be changed, moved, or extended without the consent in writing of said commission thereto being first had and obtained, and upon the further condition that an agreement satisfactory to said commission and approved by it shall be entered into on the part of said company for the proper maintenance of the crossing of said Dry Valley road, and at all times keeping the same in proper repair and condition."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MOON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DAM ACROSS RAINY LAKE RIVER.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9552) permitting the building of a dam across Rainy Lake River.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Koochiching Company, its successors and assigns, to construct across the Rainy Lake River, at any part of the rapids in section 27, township 71 north range 24 west of the fourth principal meridian, in the State of Minnesota, a dam, canal, and works necessarily incident thereto, for water-power purposes. The said dam shall be so constructed that there can at any time be constructed in connection therewith a suitable lock for navigation purposes: Provided, That the Government of the United States may at any time take possession of said dam and appurtenant works and control the same for purposes of navigation by paying the said company the actual cost of the same, but shall not do so to the destruction of the water power created by said dam to any greater extent than may be necessary to provide proper facilities for navigation: Provided further, That the works shall be constructed so as to provide for the free passage of saw logs. The said Koochiching Company, its successors and assigns, shall make such change and modification in the works as the Secretary of War may from time to time deem necessary in the interests of navigation, at its own cost and expense: Provided further, That in case any litigation arises from the obstruction of the channel by the dam, canal, or other works erected in connection therewith, the case may be tried in the proper court of the United States in the district in which the works are situated.

SEC. 2. That the right to amend, alter, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

SEC. 3. That this act shall be null and void unless the dam herein authorized be commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date hereof.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. CANNON. I would like to know what it is about.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think if the Clerk will read the report the gentleman will get all the information he desires.

Mr. CANNON. If it is not too long.

Mr. FLETCHER. This is simply a bill for the construction of a dam across a river in the northern part of Minnesota. The bill has been considered by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and it has all the usual regulations. It has gone through the committees in the usual form.

Mr. CANNON. What is the object of it?

Mr. FLETCHER. To permit the construction of a dam over a river in the northern part of Minnesota.

Mr. CANNON. To allow a private individual to build a dam?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Without any expense to the Government?

Mr. FLETCHER. Not any, sir.

Mr. CANNON. If I had known it was the gentleman's bill, I do not know that I should have made the inqury.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I think that all these dam bills, or bills providing for the construction of dams across rivers, if the use of the expression may be excused [laughter], should have a suitable provision as to fish. In some instances that has been neglected, to the utter destruction of fish propagation farther up the stream; and I think a provision of that kind should be inserted here.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I think the object sought by the gentleman from Iowa can be accomplished by inserting, in line 5, page 2 of the bill, after the word "logs," the words "and fish." I suggest that amendment to meet the requirements of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LACEY. I think that will cover the case fully.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 5, after the word "logs," insert "and fish."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr FLETCHER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, was laid on the table.

IMPROVEMENT OF BIG SANDY, AND TUG AND LOUISA FORKS OF SAME, IN KENTUCKY AND WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to prepare and submit more complete plans and estimates for the improvement of the Big Sandy, and the Tug and Louisa forks of same, in Kentucky and West Virginia, with probable cost of same if placed under the continuing-contract system.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. LOUD. Before consent is given I would like to ask the gentleman how many of these he has got in?

Mr. BERRY. Not one, and the money is already to the credit of the stream.

Mr. LOUD. How about this provision here?

Mr. BERRY. That is cut out by amendment in the report. The report cuts "under the contract system" out.

Mr. LOUD. How about this provision: "If in the opinion of the Secretary of War the work should be considered advisable," etc.?

Mr. BERRY. There has been a survey of the stream heretofore, more or less imperfect, and the resolutions ask that the survey be made out of the money to the credit of the river. That is all.

Mr. LOUD. The usual amendment ought to be added.

Mr. BERRY. There is an amendment to strike out "if placed under the continuing-contract system."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment that is proposed. The Chair understands the bill has come to the House amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6 strike out the words "if placed under the continuing-contract system."

Mr. BERRY. It means simply to survey the river, and this sum of money is now to the credit of the stream in the War Department.

Mr. CANNON. I want to give notice, Mr. Speaker, that from this time on I shall object to these bills for surveys of branches, rivers, creeks, harbors, and oceans.

Mr. LOUD. I want to say that if the gentleman from Illinois will take one half of them I will agree to take the other half.

The SPEAKER. In the meantime is there objection to this bill?

Mr. LOUD. If this is all we have got to do, Mr. Speaker, would it not be well to take a recess and rest ourselves? Nobody knows what is going on here.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, there is so much confusion that we can not hear what is going on.

Mr. LOUD. I am not one of the leaders, or I would move that we take a recess.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to have the bill read. There was so much confusion we could not hear what its provisions were.

Mr. BERRY. The gentleman from Maine asks for the reading of the report.

Mr. DINGLEY. No; I ask for the reading of the bill. We were not able to hear its provisions on account of the confusion.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the bill.

The bill was again read.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now I suggest the usual amendment be added to that, whether the proposed extended improvement in the opinion of the War Department should be made.

Mr. BERRY. There was a survey made eight or ten years ago to the dividing line between Virginia and Kentucky, and the Government had to erect a dam at a cost of $350,000. Beyond that the survey was general, and now we want to make it more specific.

Mr. DINGLEY. And in proposing to make it more specific you propose that these extended improvements shall be made.

Mr. BERRY. No; only if the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the future see fit to do it, we want to know whether it will pay to do it or not.

Mr. DINGLEY. We want the opinion of the War Department whether the proposed extended improvement ought to be made.

Mr. BERRY. Well, let that amendment be added; I have no objection.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. DINGLEY. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the resolution the following:
"; and also to submit to Congress information as to whether this proposed extended improvement should be made."

The amendment recommended by Mr. DINGLEY was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. COLSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print some remarks on the resolution in the RECORD.

The request was agreed to.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print some remarks in the RECORD on the same subject.

There was no objection.

Mr. LOUD. I move that the House take a recess for thirty minutes.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, before that is done, I would like to have unanimous consent to print some remarks in the RECORD upon this resolution just passed.

The request was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves that the House take a recess for thirty minutes.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the regular order were demanded, would the call of committees be in order?

The SPEAKER. The call of committees would be in order unless it should be proposed to take up the bill in relation to immigration.

LIFE-SAVING STATION, CHARLEVOIX, MICH.

Mr. MESICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of House bill 5522, to establish a life-saving station at Charlevoix, Mich.

Mr. LOUD. I give notice that I shall object to the consideration of any bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 5522, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish a life saving station at Charlevoix, Mich., in such locality as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may recommend.

SEC. 2. That the character of the equipments and appliances of the station, the number of men constituting its crew, and the portion of the year during which it shall be manned shall be determined by the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to authorize the establishment of a life-saving station at or near Charlevoix, Mich."

Mr. LOUD. I object, Mr. Speaker, and I shall object to any bill that is presented here. I am fair to all of you.

Mr. COLSON. I do not think the gentleman from California has any right to make a blanket objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, the last time that there was a call of committees the Committee on Public Lands had the floor and disposed of a number of bills. What is known as the Arkansas settlement bill was called, and after it had been placed before the House it went over for further consideration when the call of committees should have again become the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Then that committee should have the floor with that bill.

Mr. LACEY. Now, I have no objection, the bill being an important one, and would take some time to discuss, that it should be passed by under unanimous consent until the Judiciary Committee has disposed of their business, if the House will consent to that. Otherwise we are ready to go on with the Arkansas bill.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Iowa state what bill it is, so that it can be reported to the House?

Mr. LACEY. It is Senate bill No. 3.

Mr. DINGLEY. There was a point of order reserved.

Mr. LACEY. I do not think that point of order will be made and urged. It was only reserved against the bill.

Mr. Speaker, this Arkansas bill, if it is presented to the House in the state of expectancy that exists at this time, I am afraid might not receive that full consideration that its importance demands, and therefore I suggest the propriety of allowing the Judiciary Committee to be called without prejudice to the Public Lands Committee and let this bill go over.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I understand the Chair has difficulty in hearing the gentleman from Iowa. Is there any objection to his standing on the reporter's desk?

Mr. LACEY. I will bow in submission to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I will get a little nearer him.

Mr. SIMPSON. "Nearer, my God, to Thee." [Laughter.]

Mr. LACEY. I would like to have my proposition for unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, submitted to the House. I will restate it, as, owing to the great confusion, my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] did not hear it. I always want him to hear me. When the last call of committees occurred, the Public Lands Committee had the floor and disposed of a number of bills. What is known as the Arkansas compromise bill was called up, and after it had been placed before the House an adjournment occurred and the resolution went over for further consideration when the call of committees should become the regular order again. Now, that bill is an important one. It is one that the committee has spent a great deal of time upon and one the House ought to fully understand and ought not to be required to act upon at a time when we are about to consider another matter of such infinite importance to the country.

Therefore I suggested the propriety of allowing the Committee on Public Lands to retain its present privileged position as to this particular bill, allowing the call to return to the Judiciary Committee, which committee was passed the other day without prejudice; and after the business of the Judiciary Committee shall have been completed, the Public Lands Committee to have the same rights with respect to this bill that it would have if the consideration of the bill were proceeded with at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Lands be passed without prejudice.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to call attention to the fact that a point of order has been reserved against the bill.

Mr. LACEY. Let that reservation continue. Of course my proposition is that the status of the bill continue as it is at this moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This arrangement will not make any difference as to the point or order.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to ask the gentlemen from Iowa in all sincerity whether there is any business, except such as the House is waiting for, which it can transact now with any discretion whatever any better than it can attend to the business now regularly in order. What are we going to do if we pass this bill over?

Mr. LACEY. This business can not be disposed of in the next ten minutes. We might proceed to its consideration, but could not complete it before the Cuban resolutions come up.

Mr. LOUD. What is the use of passing it over? What are you going to do?

Mr. LACEY. I understand the gentleman substantially to object. Then let the bill be read.

Mr. LOUD. We might just as well fool away time on this as on anything else.

Mr. LACEY. We do not want to fool away time on anything.

Mr. LOUD. The House seems to want to do so.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the House take a recess for ten minutes.

The question being taken, there were on a division—ayes 150, noes 68.

Mr. RICHARDSON and others called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CANNON and Mr. RICHARDSON were appointed.

The tellers proceeded with the count, but before a report of the result had been made,

Mr. CANNON said: With the assent of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], I withdraw the motion for a recess.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the motion for a recess will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER resumed the chair.

CUBA.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to present the following resolution, and to ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, on behalf of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom were referred House joint resolutions Nos. 54, 58, 86, 94, 173, 186, 193, 200, 201, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 217, 219, 220, 224, and 231, and House resolutions Nos. 250 and 279, and House concurrent resolutions Nos. 5 and 28, and Senate joint resolution No. 26, having fully considered the same and the numerous petitions relating to the same subject, report the following joint resolution as a substitute for the said several resolutions and recommend its adoption. The committee refer to the facts set forth in the message of the President to Congress, dated April 11, 1898, to the consular reports accompanying it and to the report of the naval court of inquiry upon the destruction of the U. S. battle ship Maine in Havana Harbor February 15, 1898, in support of the joint resolution herewith reported.

ROBT. ADAMS, JR.,
Chairman pro tempore.

Whereas the Government of Spain for three years past has been waging war on the Island of Cuba against a revolution by the inhabitants thereof, without making any substantial progress toward the suppression of said revolution, and has conducted the warfare in a manner contrary to the laws of nations, by methods inhuman and uncivilized, causing the death by starvation of more than 200,000 innocent noncombatants, the victims being for the most part helpless women and children, inflicting intolerable injury to the commercial interests of the United States, involving the destruction of the lives and property of many of our citizens, entailing the expenditure of millions of money in patrolling our coasts and policing the high seas in order to maintain our neutrality; and

Whereas this long series of losses, injuries, and burdens for which Spain is responsible has culminated in the destruction of the United States battle ship Maine in the harbor of Havana and in the death of 260 of our seamen:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is hereby authorized and directed to intervene at once to stop the war in Cuba, to the end and with the purpose of securing permanent peace and order there and establishing by the free action of the people thereof a stable and independent government of their own in the Island of Cuba. And the President is hereby authorized and empowered to use the land and naval forces of the United States to execute the purpose of this resolution.

[Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BAILEY. Reserving the right to object, I will ask that the views of the minority go with this report.

Mr. BERRY. Pending the motion——

Mr. ADAMS. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY] for the purpose of offering the minority resolution and report, reserving my parliamentary rights.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands there is no objection to consideration.

Mr. BAILEY. I reserve the right to object, because whether we shall object or not will depend in some measure upon whether a fair understanding about the debate can be arrived at. Before we proceed to that, I desire both propositions to be before the House.

Mr. QUIGG. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. BAILEY. Which is an objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] objected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. BAILEY. "The gentleman from Texas" did not object. "The gentleman from Texas" reserved his right to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BAILEY. "The gentleman from Texas" reserves his right to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BAILEY. I ask permission that the gentleman from Kentucky——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce whether there is objection or not.

Mr. BAILEY. The Chair is determined to try to force the minority—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BAILEY. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RICHARDSON. They are simply playing for a mean political advantage, and the people of the country ought to know it.

Mr. HENDERSON. There was a perfect understanding with the Democratic members of the Foreign Affairs Committee on this point.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is not true, if we are to understand that any such arrangement as this was agreed to.

[At this point a personal colloquy occurred between several members, the remarks not being addressed to the Chair, amid great confusion, to quell which the Speaker directed the Sergeant-at-Arms to proceed with the mace and require members to take their seats.]

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that gentlemen be required to take their seats.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask to have the words of gentlemen taken down.

The SPEAKER. No business of any kind will be transacted until gentlemen have resumed their seats and order is restored upon the floor.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask to make a single statement looking to the orderly conduct of the business of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there will be no objection to that.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I think the House knows me well enough to know that I have no desire other than to proceed in an orderly way with the business of this body.

An effort has been made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] to present for consideration a resolution looking to the settlement of some grave and important complications in which the United States has been involved. I think I can truly say that there is not one member on the floor of this House who does not desire the early consideration of that important matter. I understand that the majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs have a report to make, and that the minority have views to submit, and that if there can be an understanding, fixing the time for debate and the method of procedure, there is no objection on this side of the House, certainly, but, on the contrary, a very great anxiety to dispose of the entire matter at this time.

And I repeat, Mr. Speaker—and I think that characterizes not only the views of gentlemen on this side of the House, but I think it characterizes just as well the views of gentlemen on the other side—that there is every desire for prompt action.

The SPEAKER. There has been some misunderstanding. The Chair supposed that that question had been settled.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I suggest this: This side of the House does not want to be cut off from the right to amend the proposition that may be made, or to be cut off from the right to debate, for a reasonable time, a proposition that affects the whole people not only of this country, but other countries as well.

I hope, therefore, we can come to some understanding as to the method of dealing with the question by proceeding in a fair and orderly way in the consideration of the matter, which could not have been done under the request for unanimous consent, because motions could have been interposed to cut off all debate or opportunity of amendment.

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman allow me a question before he takes his seat? I wish to ask if he does not know it to be a fact that there is no objection on this side of the House to the reception of any minority report or any report that gentlemen on the other side of the House desired to present?

Mr. BAILEY. It must be understood——

Mr. QUIGG. My question was addressed to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Mr. BAILEY. I am entirely willing that the member from New York shall not address any questions to me.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. BAILEY. I will answer any question that any decent man on that side may ask.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I call for the regular order and for decent proceedings on the floor of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee will undoubtedly answer any question the gentleman from New York has asked him.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is it not a fact that the joint resolution reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not now before the House, having met an objection from the gentleman from Texas, whereby it was withdrawn from the action of the House at this time?

The SPEAKER. That is the parliamentary situation, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMillin] desired to address the House, which he did by the consent of the House, upon the question of what amount of debate should be had or what action should be taken. Such discussion or statement is, of course, by unanimous consent. It can not be persisted in against the request of any member.

Mr. ADAMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, the regular order has been demanded, but I am entirely willing that the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall be permitted to make his statement; but to that——

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order.

Mr. BAILEY. But to that statement I myself shall desire the privilege of making a reply, because the objection which the Chair——

Mr. STEELE. I call for the regular order again.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for.

Mr. BAILEY. By the gentleman from Indiana, I hope the Chair will state.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been called for.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is there any parliamentary rule of procedure that prevents the minority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs from filing its report here and having it read?

The SPEAKER. There is.

Mr. QUIGG. There will be no objection to that.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Berry] may be permitted——

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. Permitted! He has the right.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Regular order!

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Gentlemen, are you going to call the regular order before I make my statement? I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Berry] may be permitted to hand to the Clerk and have read the resolution and report of the minority, and that questions as to the limitation of debate may be held in abeyance until after that is done.

Mr. CANNON. That is right; go ahead.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I demanded that the words of the gentleman be taken down.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope that the request for unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Berry], who represents the minority of the committee, may have read at the desk the minority resolution, to be presented as an amendment, may be granted. [Applause.]

Mr. BERRY. I submit to the Speaker, is not that the right of the minority?

Mr. DINGLEY. Let it be read for information. The other has been read for information. Now, let this be read. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, then, the minority proposition will be read.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I only wanted it read for information.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let it be read for information.

Mr. ADAMS. Reserving my objection, I wish to say that this agreement was made which is now asked for by unanimous consent between Mr. Dinsmore, the ranking member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, Mr. Berry, and myself. What is now asked for had already been agreed upon, until this unwarranted interruption broke in. Despite the complaints that have been made, it had all been arranged with gentlemen on the other side. Therefore I wish to state that, having made the statement, I have no objection to the reading of this.

Mr. DINSMORE. If I may be permitted to make a statement——

The SPEAKER. One moment. The House will please be in order.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ADAMS. I understand that the resolutions of the majority are before the House.

The SPEAKER. They are not.

Mr. ADAMS. Then I must offer them again, sir.

The SPEAKER. They are not before the House, and they have been objected to, and can not be offered.

Mr. ADAMS. Then I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope the gentleman will let this report be read first.

Mr. BERRY. I rise to a question of parliamentary law.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine has asked unanimous consent that the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky be read for the information of the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is, the substitute resolution.

The SPEAKER. The substitute resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. BERRY. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not the right of the minority to submit their report without that unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is not their right to submit it in this way. It can be submitted through the Clerk, and can be printed in due course, but the question before the House is, Will it grant consent to have it read for information?

Mr. QUIGG. This is not a submission of the report.

The SPEAKER. It is not a reporting of the substitute.

Mr. QUIGG. It is not a submission of the substitute resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is not a submission of the substitute resolution, but simply to be read for the information of the House, and requires the unanimous consent of the House, and if there be no objection it will be read.

Mr. McEWAN. For information.

The SPEAKER. For information only.

Mr. BERRY. I desire to present the views of the minority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to know is this resolution the substitute resolution, or is it the report of the minority?

The SPEAKER. Consent has been given for the reading of the substitute resolution only.

Mr. DALZELL. I did not understand that consent had been given to the reading of the views of the minority.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, was not consent given to the reading of the views presenting the resolution?

Mr. DINGLEY. My request was that the substitute resolution proposed should be read to the House by general agreement, the majority resolution having been read by common agreement, and that being done I asked that the minority resolution be read.

Mr. BERRY. There is no report submitted by the majority except the statement in connection with the resolutions. [Cries of "Read!"]

Mr. DINSMORE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DINSMORE. I just want to know, Mr. Speaker, if the procedure demands that the views of the minority be read after the reading of the resolution.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. No.

Mr. DINSMORE (continuing). Before a vote is to be taken by the House?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. No.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest that the resolution be read first and let the other go over for the present.

Mr. BERRY. Gentlemen on that side would like to have some light on the subject, and if they will have it read, they will get it.

Mr. PITNEY. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled—

Section 1. That the United States Government hereby recognizes the independence of the Republic of Cuba.

[Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Sec. 2. That, moved thereto by many considerations of humanity, of interest, and of provocation, among which are the deliberate mooring of our battle ship, the Maine, over a submarine mine and its destruction in the harbor of Havana, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed to employ immediately the land and naval forces of the United States in aiding the Republic of Cuba to maintain the independence hereby recognized.

[Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Sec. 3. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to extend immediate relief to the starving people of Cuba.

Mr. ADAMS. I now renew my request for unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BAILEY. Pending that, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. I want to know whether he is attempting to force this resolution through, momentous as it is, without opportunity for fair debate? [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ADAMS. I will answer that that is a question that lies entirely within the purview of this House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I ask the gentleman, as acting chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and as the spokesman of that committee, what his intention is in this particular?

Mr. ADAMS. I simply repeat my statement that that is entirely in the hands of this House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The gentleman's answer is an evasion and does not answer my question. I object. [Applause on the Democratic side and hisses on the Republican side.]

A MEMBER. Bring in the rule. [Cries of "Rule!"]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I object until there is an opportunity for proper debate upon a question so momentous. Why, the proposition is monstrous. [Hisses on the Republican side and applause on the Democratic side. Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess for twenty minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House take a recess for twenty minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that.

Mr. ADAMS. I withdraw that motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Speaker, there is such confusion that we can not hear anything that is taking place.

Mr. MAHON. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The motion has been withdrawn.

COMPROMISE, ETC., BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND ARKANSAS.

The SPEAKER. The business in order is the consideration of Senate bill No. 3, entitled "A bill to approve a compromise and settlement between the United States and the State of Arkansas."

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I think this will be an opportune time to pass this measure, and if I can obtain the attention of the House I will endeavor to soothe their nerves somewhat by taking up something easier than the question we have thus far been unable to consider.

Mr. CLAYTON. Can we not have order, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The Chair must insist on order, and gentlemen must resume their seats.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. What is the gentleman addressing himself to?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the bill has not been read. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the compromise and settlement effected February 23, 1895, between the United States and the State of Arkansas by John G. Carlisle, Secretary of the Treasury, and Hoke Smith, Secretary of the Interior, on behalf of the United States, and James P. Clarke, governor of Arkansas, on behalf of that State, which was made under and by virtue of the authority conferred by an act of Congress approved August 4, 1894, entitled "An act to authorize a compromise and settlement with the State of Arkansas," and the act of the general assembly of Arkansas, approved April 8, 1869, authorizing the governor to act for that State, be, and the same is hereby, approved and given the full force and effect of law.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

"SEC. 2. That the amount of $662,971.35, with which the State is credited in said compromise and settlement for 132,594.27 acres of indemnity land, at the price of $5 an acre, be, and the same is hereby, reduced to the amount of $331,485.63, the value of said indemnity land at $2.50 an acre, the double minimum price of Government land; and the State of Arkansas is hereby credited with the sum of $331,485.68 for 265,188.54 acres of additional selected unadjusted swamp land at $1.25 per acre, the minimum price of Government land, leaving the balance to be paid by the State of Arkansas to the United States under said compromise and settlement $160,572.

"SEC. 3. That the title of all persons who have purchased from the State of Arkansas any unconfirmed swamp land and hold deeds for the same be, and the same is hereby, confirmed and made valid as against any claim or right of the United States, and without the payment of said persons, their heirs or assigns, of any sum whatever to the United States or to the State of Arkansas.

"SEC. 4. That the State of Arkansas does hereby relinquish and quitclaim to the United States all lands heretofore confirmed, certified, or patented to the State which have been entered under the public-land laws; and does hereby cede, relinquish, and quitclaim to the United States all right, title, and interest under the acts of September 28, 1850, March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857, in and to all lands in the State which have been heretofore granted, confirmed, certified, or patented by the United States under any other acts, and the title to such lands is hereby confirmed in the grantees, their heirs, successors, or assigns, anything in this act or any other act to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That this act shall be of no force or effect until the State of Arkansas shall have accepted and approved the conditions, limitations, and provisions herein contained by an act of the general assembly or by an instrument in writing duly executed by the governor under the authority conferred upon him by the legislature of said State, and filed with the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior within one year from the approval of this act: Provided further, That whereas the general assembly of the State of Arkansas did, on the 10th day of March, 1897, accept and approve the conditions, limitations, and provisions herein contained before the passage of this act, making the same effective and conclusive; therefore, this act shall be in full force and effect from and after its passage."

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE in the chair). The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] makes the point of order against the bill that it should be considered in Committee of the Whole. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] on that point of order.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I understand that my colleague does not wish to press the point of order.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the bill should be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. I understood that a motion was made that the House take a recess for twenty minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion was withdrawn by unanimous consent.

Mr. COX. I never heard that unanimous consent. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Iowa on the point of order.

Mr. LACEY. I am afraid the Chair will not hear me unless there is better order than we have had for a while. I will endeavor to make myself heard, however. Gentlemen will observe the number of members present, and I have no doubt they all came here to hear the Arkansas bill disposed of to-day. There seems to be a large audience in the galleries, and the regular order has been demanded a number of times, so that it really seems that this is the burning question of the hour. [Laughter.]

But this matter is really quite old. The settlement that is before the House in this Senate bill arose because of transactions away back in 1837. Before the war the people of Arkansas were caught with the then common idea of printing a large amount of paper money and turning it loose on an unsuspecting public, and they organized what was known as the Real Estate Bank down there and issued State bonds in aid of the bank, in order that it might use the bonds as a basis of circulation and make money plenty. They had their good time with this wild-cat money about sixty years ago, with the usual result that the bank failed and the paper was lost by the holders and the money went out of circulation. Now, during this time——

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. We can not tell whether the gentleman is calling us liars or making a speech on the Arkansas bill.

Mr. LACEY. The din of expectation on the Cuban resolutions can not be stifled. You can read the report of my remarks in the morning. I have no doubt the stenographers will get it all in. I will try at least to make them hear.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this matter arose in this way: These bonds were turned over to the Government of the United States as an investment for the Smithsonian Institution. Subsequently the war came on and the bonds had not been paid. The Government made good the bonds to the Smithsonian Institution, and the State bonds have remained in the custody and control of the United States Government ever since.

The State of Arkansas, on the other hand, has some old claims against the Government of the United States growing out of land matters. The questions have been the subject of controversy between the United States Government and the State of Arkansas for nearly half a century, and it is of the utmost importance that these questions should be settled before we get into hostility with any foreign powers, because we want the assistance of the State of Arkansas in the approaching difficulty, and I fear that we should not have that hearty sympathy that we ought to have if we do not make an adjustment of this before it is too late.

This proposition of settlement has come up time and again for a good many years, and was referred by the Fifty-third Congress to the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior, and they were directed to enter upon negotiation for a settlement of all these old controversies for the surrender of the bonds of the State of Arkansas on the one hand, and for the relinquishment of the claims against the Government of the United States held by the State of Arkansas on the other, the settlement to be subject to the approval of Congress.

The Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Treasury have made a compromise settlement and reported the same to Congress, and the question arises as to whether the agreement shall be confirmed by Congress.

The Senate has passed the bill, and it is now before this House for consideration. This settlement, by the terms of the statute under which the settlement was made——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will come to order. Gentlemen will be seated.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I am advised that the Committee on Rules desires to make report of the Cuban resolutions; and that being the case, I do not wish to delay action by further discussion of the Arkansas bill, and I would like to make some arrangement for the withdrawal of this bill for the present without prejudice till the next regular call of committees. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside now without prejudice, to be called up on the next call of committees, being the regular order on that call.

The SPEAKER. It will be the regular order as unfinished business.

CUBA.

Mr. HENDERSON. I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, having had under consideration House resolution No. 284, as to consideration of report of Committee on Foreign Affairs, recommend that the following be adopted as a substitute:

"Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to the consideration of the resolution of the Committee on Foreign Affairs upon the President's message with respect to conditions in Cuba."

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, it will be observed that this proposed rule, if adopted, only brings the matter before the House for consideration; and it will be within the power of the House itself at any time to close debate.

The rule contains no proposition for closing debate. The sentiment on this side of the House is almost overwhelmingly in favor of action, not of talk. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The resolution reported but a brief time ago from the Committee on Foreign Affairs by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] is stamped with the unanimous judgment of the Republican members of that committee. The time has come, in the opinion of this country, for action on this great question. It has been discussed by the public press; it has been discussed in the pulpit; it has been discussed in the House and in the Senate; it has been discussed at every fireside in the American Republic, and we believe, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come, sad as it is that I must express it, that this country can no longer delay acting in the Cuban situation. Everything has been done by our Chief Executive to secure peace on that island without arms, but in vain; and the time has come when arms, the last resort, must be appealed to by our country. I have been and am for peace, but not at the expense of my country's peace and honor. Spain must leave the western seas, and forever. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I yield to the gentleman from Texas, reserving my time.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, myself and my colleague, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], heartily agreed to the rule which provides for the immediate consideration of this important resolution. It would not have been necessary to hold a session of the Committee on Rules if the gentlemen on that side of the House had been patient enough to allow those of us on this side to propose an understanding with the acting chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in regard to debate.

The House will remember that I simply reserved the right to object in order to ascertain if it were possible to reach an agreement about the time to be occupied in debate, and while the gentleman representing the minority of that committee was attempting to present a resolution which has the indorsement of himself and his associates, I was required either to consent to the immediate consideration of the proposition presented by the chairman of the committee or to deny to my own side the right to present its views to the House and to the country.

That I asked only what was reasonable will be testified to by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], because, after the unseemly occurrence which came more nearly disgracing the House of Representatives than any other act which has occurred during my membership of this body, the gentleman's own sense of fairness compelled him to ask the House to do precisely and only what I had asked for in the beginning. I only asked that the question of unanimous consent might be suspended until those who spoke for this side of the House could present their resolutions, so that the whole question could be decided and decided at one time. If I had consented, then it would have been within the power of any member on that side of the House to prevent our side from presenting its resolution. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, holding the floor, could have demanded the previous question on his resolution, and the minority not only would have been prevented from presenting theirs, but the matter would have been disposed of without the expression of a single sentiment on this side of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. If the rule presented here now is adopted, and the majority sees proper—I do not know that it will—but if it sees proper to sustain a demand for the previous question, could they not accomplish exactly the same thing as that to which the gentleman has been referring?

Mr. BAILEY. Undoubtedly. But we can present our resolution under this rule; and if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] had declined to come to a reasonable understanding for debate, I still did not intend to interfere with the immediate consideration of this resolution; but I wanted the country to understand that—— [Derisive laughter and jeers on the Republican side.]

A MEMBER. Do not pay any attention to them.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I believe I will not disgrace myself by commenting on such behavior as that. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the House will not allow itself to express its dissent or approval——

Mr. BAILEY. I did not hear the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was suggesting that it has been the custom of the House heretofore, and the Chair believes it would be better if it were adhered to, not to express either approval or disapproval of remarks made on the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. That is one decision in which I most thoroughly and heartily concur. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. It is not a decision, but merely a suggestion.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I am gratified to know that after fifteen months of delay and suspense, it has at last dawned upon the Republican majority of this House that the time for action has arrived. [Applause on the Democratic side.] For more than a year we have been entreating you to take some action. During the whole of this session we have appealed to you to act. And it is at least some satisfaction that you have resolved at last, not to heed our appeal, but to heed your angry constituents at home. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But true to your policy and your traditions, you have resolved that when at last you are compelled to act you will deny to members of this body the opportunity to discuss your conduct.

There is a radical difference between the resolutions reported by the majority and those reported by the minority. There ought to be time and opportunity allowed for those of us who think the minority resolutions the wiser to point out to the House and to the country the reasons for our belief. And yet I know as well as the members on that side that these resolutions that involve the question of peace or war are to be rushed through this body with a short and insufficient debate, and that, too, when every man in the country knows that nothing can be done until the Senate acts, and you know that the Senate will act with proper deliberation.

But, Mr. Speaker, we would rather have action at last without discussion than to have the practice of the last twelve months—allowing ample discussion and no decision. [Applause.] The true rule ought to be that questions of this kind can be fairly discussed and finally decided; but the rule which now prevails is that when the House finally determines to decide a question that is the very time the House refuses to allow debate upon it. You will suffer debate to proceed day after day.

I have seen it proceed more than a week upon a question which you had no purpose of deciding. I have heard this very question discussed in a general way twenty times within the present session, and yet, having allowed the debate while you did not intend to decide, now that you are going to decide you deny debate. But, sir, we are as ready to meet the question, we are as ready to decide it, we are as ready to take our responsibility, as gentlemen on the other side, and we invite you to call the roll. [Applause and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. MCMILLIN rose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Tennessee, a member of the Committee on Rules, desire to make some remarks?

Mr. MCMILLIN. For a few minutes only. What time is there remaining to our side, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Eleven minutes on that side.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to ask whether there is anything in the rules of the House that would limit the discussion of the matter now under consideration to members of the Committee on Rules after they have first had an opportunity to be heard?

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. In other words, have certain gentlemen a monopoly of the floor on this important proposition?

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], who is a member of the Committee on Rules, as in charge of the proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I am not reflecting on the Chair. The Chair probably did right to recognize the gentleman from Iowa; but I make a sincere parliamentary inquiry, whether there is to be any opportunity, whether there can be under the rules any opportunity, for those not members of the Committee on Rules to be heard on the proposition now being discussed, which involves the question of the limitation of debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the previous question was not asked for; but when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] intends to do it, or whether he will do it at all, is something the Chair can not say.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I hope the gentleman, after having voiced his sentiments, having undertaken to speak for the Republican side of the House, will not be ungenerous enough to move the previous question until other gentlemen who dissent from his views have had the right to be heard.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I will yield a portion of my time—what time is remaining to our side, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield some time to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. HENDERSON. I yielded none of my time to anybody. I reserved it. They are speaking and consuming their twenty minutes on the other side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The twenty minutes would follow the ordering of the previous question.

Mr. HENDERSON. But we propose to debate it a few minutes.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then I will proceed in my own time. Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I reserved the balance of my time after a brief explanation of the resolution.

Mr. DINGLEY. That gives an hour.

Mr. HENDERSON. The gentleman from Texas, when we were in committee preparing this resolution, said he wanted to use two or three minutes, and that was all, as we preferred to let the time be used for the general discussion of the resolution of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Now, it is my intention as soon as I assume the floor to ask the previous question, so that that would end the forty minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, then, yields how much time to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. HENDERSON. If we could have order around here, we could get along.

Mr. RICHARDSON. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McMILLIN. I thought I was recognized in my own right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Iowa intended to yield time, remaining in control of the measure.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is no twenty or forty minutes.

The SPEAKER. There is no thirty or forty minutes. The gentleman from Iowa has an hour, and he yields how much time to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. HENDERSON. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. McMILLIN. I had taken the floor in my own right.

Mr. HENDERSON. I can not yield for that purpose, I will state to my friend.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would not be uncandid with the gentleman.

Mr. HENDERSON. You are always fair, and that is the only way to get along. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. McMILLIN. I will take only five minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield the gentleman five minutes out of my time.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, the most momentous question that has confronted the American people since the close of the great civil war confronts us to-day. For once in few times in our history we are about to launch out in what amounts inevitably to a conflict of arms with another country.

I sympathize with the expressions that have thus far fallen on both sides, from the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Texas, as to the propriety of early action; but I do not agree with the gentleman from Iowa and with the sentiment which seems to be strong on the other side of the House, that there ought not to be a candid and ample presentation of this great question to the representatives of the American people and through them to the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There is, Mr. Speaker, a great difference between these two resolutions. It is known that a year ago, or nearly a year ago, there came from the Senate a resolution recognizing the belligerent rights of Cuba. I, on behalf of gentlemen on this side, moved to suspend the rules and pass it.

That side of the House fled from it by forcing an adjournment of the House and preventing consideration. It is the most unfortunate day that this Congress has experienced when that sad action was taken; for if that day we had simply recognized the rights of Cuba and given her a chance to win her independence—if we had taken our revenue cutters from around her borders and given the patriotic people of this country a chance to send them supplies, and for them to buy supplies, without armies that will perish from yellow fever, and without foreign complications, Cuba would have been free to-day, and we would have been free from obligations. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CLAYTON. And the Maine would have been afloat.

Mr. McMILLIN. And to-day 266 gallant American sailors, whose glory will not fade until that flag fades on account of their sacrifice for their country, would have been living American sailors.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what excuse are we going to give the American people for hasty action in this matter? The resolution of the majority does not propose to recognize the Republic of Cuba, and the resolution of the minority does. The resolution of the majority does not force the President to send our Army and our Navy to back up this action immediately; the resolution of the minority does. They differ as the poles differ, and their differences ought to be shown and the Representatives here given an opportunity to show which one of the resolutions best accomplishes the work to be performed.

You heard the President's message. You know the spirit that it breathed. You know the indecision that characterized it. You know there was no free Cuba in it; and yet you propose to turn over to him the Army, you propose to turn over to him the Navy, and turn back to him the Treasury and give him discretion to fight or not to fight, as he pleases. So far as I am concerned, and I believe I represent the members on this side of the House, we are not only in favor of free Cuba, but we intend that the President of the United States shall not stand in the way of that freedom. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Let us have ample discussion; let us have deliberate action. When we shall send the Army there; how much we shall send is important; how we shall raise revenues is important. We are taking a step that is of the utmost importance, and yet we are about to tell the American people that in this momentous question there shall not be calm deliberation. It does us injustice to legislate in such a way.

Let us adopt this resolution; it is right, for it gives early consideration, but let the House not then flee from a careful and painstaking discussion of the question that affects for weal or woe not only the people of this country, but of all other countries. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HENDERSON. My friend from Texas is entirely at liberty to justify his remarks and proceed at once to the consideration of the bill. With that I have no controversy, but he has presented a singular spectacle here to-day. He has attempted again and again to force action in this House, on his own statement, under any circumstances, on any bill, and at any time. And now he pleads for time, because the Senate is going to deliberate, and urges that as an argument, and winds up by wanting us to call the roll now. I want to say to the gentleman and to the House that I regard the attempts to make partisanship out of this great national question [cries of "Oh!" on the Democratic side]—I regard any effort of that kind from any gentleman as unwise.

I have made no such effort; but I want to say here and now that when he attacks the Chief Executive and the Republican party for the deliberation, the care, that has been taken in making contracts with every powder manufactory in the country, preparing shot and shell to overcome the difficulties that have been forced upon the country in the past by false policies, he is unjust to himself, the party, and to the President. We have looked with care at all the great dangers that confronted us.

We have weighed, as has the President, with brain and heart, the whole question and all that confronts the country in settling this great problem. That has been done wisely, and if done wisely and well, it was quickly done. Now, we are here for action, and I want to say to the gentleman from Texas that with scarcely a dissenting voice we are ready for the roll call in this House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I challenge that statement. There are men on this side of the Chamber who are not ready for a roll call.

Mr. HENDERSON. I made one exception——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The gentleman is mistaken. I challenge his statement. We are not ready for the roll call. We desire to discuss the serious question involved in the resolution before a vote is had.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. HENDERSON. No.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana must take his seat. The gentleman from Iowa declines to yield.

[Mr. JOHNSON continued speaking.]

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will proceed unless the gentleman resumes his seat; and the House will please be in order.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared with the mace.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not yield the floor. I do not know what the purpose of the gentleman is.

Mr. POWERS. It is to have the words of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] taken down.

Mr. HENDERSON. He did not have the floor, and I would not have them taken down.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I have no objection to my words being taken down. I can repeat them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is not in order.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I have only one word to say in closing, and that is—and I want the attention of my good friend from Texas—this side of the House, and I do not include exceptions [laughter], and all that they represent, are ready here and now to answer to the roll call of country and honor on this floor or on the plains of Cuba. [Applause on the Republican side.] Now, Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on this rule. That does not apply to the main question, only to the rule.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 290, noes none.

So the previous question was ordered.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana have ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. The House has just ordered the previous question.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. A request for unanimous consent subsequent to that is not affected by that order. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana have ten minutes on the floor. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question being put, the resolution reported by the Committee on Rules was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] upon the resolution which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President is hereby authorized and directed to intervene at once to stop the war in Cuba, to the end and with the purpose of securing permanent peace and order there and establishing by the free action of the people thereof a stable and independent government of their own in the Island of Cuba; and the President is hereby authorized and empowered to use the land and naval forces of the United States to execute the purpose of this resolution.

Mr. ADAMS. For the purpose of permitting the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY] to offer the minority resolution, I yield to him, reserving my rights.

Mr. BERRY. I offer as a substitute the minority report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY] offers as a substitute the resolution which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States Government hereby recognizes the independence of the Republic of Cuba.

SEC. 2. That, moved thereto by many considerations of humanity, of interest, and of provocation, among which are the deliberate mooring of our battle ship, the Maine, over a submarine mine and its destruction in the harbor of Havana, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed to employ immediately the land and naval forces of the United States in aiding the Republic of Cuba to maintain the independence hereby recognized.

SEC. 3. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to extend immediate relief to the starving people of Cuba.

Mr. ADAMS. I now move the previous question on the resolution and substitute to final passage.

Mr. BAILEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If that motion prevails, will there be forty minutes allowed for debate on the question?

The SPEAKER. If the motion for the previous question prevails, that will be the case.

Mr. ADAMS. I call for a vote on my motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I rise to ask a question of the Chair.

Mr. ADAMS. I yield to the gentleman.
